Inside the Maze and out, ministers keep on searching for solutions

A visit to the Maze prison, in the tense wake of the assassination of loyalist Billy Wright inside its walls, is not without its ironies. "Smuggling prohibited" declares a large notice at the gate. "Warning - no firearms beyond this point" says another.

A few miles away three INLA prisoners accused of killing Wright with two smuggled firearms were being remanded in custody. When charged, one of them coolly told police: "Billy Wright was executed for one reason and for one reason only, and that was for directing and waging a campaign of terror against the nationalist people from his prison cell."

While the republicans were on the outside being charged, security minister Adam Ingram was inside the jail explaining why there would be no resignations of ministers or officials: "This is a very unique prison. It's unique in the whole of the democratic world. Nowhere is there such a concentration of dedicated paramilitaries and terrorists, and that does make a very a Catholic-frequented disco in Co Tyrone killings. Martin McGuinness of Sinn Fein unique situation."

Twenty miles away Wright's associates were busy organising for his funeral today. That too will be a unique occasion in that he thought a lot about death, partly because he had survived a number of previous assassination attempts; and also, perhaps. because he had inflicted a fair amount of death himself.

He left behind detailed instructions for his own funeral. He wanted a member of the Rev Ian Paisley's Free Presbyterian church to officiate at the service, and another clergyman, a one-time loyalist prisoner who has since become a pastor, to give a graveside oration.

In the meantime, the security forces are hoping that members of the Loyalist Volunteer Force, the group which Wright founded and led, will not be planning further violent retaliation for his death. They now think Saturday night's LVF attack on

In the wake of the incident the police and army have stepped up patrols in a number of areas, paying particular attention to Catholic bars and hotels and other locations which might be targets for further LVF attacks. The situation in many areas is tense.

Back at the Maze, meanwhile, the minister's own car was subjected to a thorough search by paratroopers who looked in the boot and opened a suitcase before letting him through.

Media personnel who wished to question him were identified, searched and driven within the prison complex in a minibus with opaque windows. They were then de- solutely no. Resignations are not on the livered at a gate set in a perimeter wall which is 16ft high and which runs for two and a half miles. It is studded with occasional 30ft high watch-towers, its high points festooned with wires, cameras and searchlights. An escorted walk through a series of gates and four turnstiles followed, leading to a training room. In a corner, training manuals for a "custodial care vocational qualification for prison officers laid out security rules. Element 2.1 dealt with "maintaining security during routine movement of prisoners within the establishment", which is what officers were doing with Billy

Wright when he was gunned down. Mr Ingram announced a new programme of regular and random searches in the prison together with a series of enquiries into the various incidents and the general running of the jail. Asked whether the Government would accede to Unionist calls for resignations he retorted: "Abcards. In Northern Ireland local politicians can be long on comment but very short on solutions and answers."

The Seychelles, a perfect break for a new puritan

Tony Blair quietly slipped away from his little local difficulties over cuts in benefits yesterday, and took his family to soak up the sunshine in the Marxist paradise of the Seychelles. Jack O'Sullivan and Colin Brown investigate prime ministerial holiday precedents.

Labour prime ministers traditionally like to holiday close to home. To Harold Wilson. abroad meant work, so he opted for the austerity of a bungalow in the Scilly Isles. Clement Atlee visited Pembrokeshire, the Republic of Ireland when feeling adventurous. And Jim Callaghan generally preferred his Sussex farm.

But not Tony Blair who yesterday landed en famille in the Seychelles, a Bounty bar paradise in the Indian Ocean.

Churchill, who liked to holiday in the Aegean with Aristotle Onassis, and with Lord Beaverbrook in France, would have sympathised. So would Ted Hobart ocean yacht race in prime minister. And Anthony Eden - frustrated at missing his Malta holiday because of the behind all that fuss about single parents and the disabled.

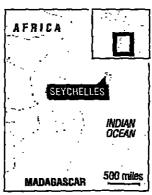

with wife, mother-in-law and three children, flying on to a smaller island, La Digue. It is said to be like the Channel Island of Sark with sunshine - no Heath, who won the Sydney to cars, only bikes and ox-carts. There he can sunbathe on 1969, months before becoming Anse Source D'Argent, the most photographed beach in the world, on an island which was the setting for Gualbar Suez crisis - would have recog- Emmanuelle, the soft-porn nised Mr Blair's need to leave movie. This would reduce all but the best-off to eating coconuts for the week. But the Blairs will pay the full bill, while the taxpayer picks up the tab for the bodyguards and administration staff, known as the "garden girls". There will be a few re-like Mr Blair, about the Queen Mother and her daughter, whose image still graces postage stamps. And Mahe has a Little Ben clock tower.

But the Prime Minister may be less comfortable with France-Albert Rene. President of the Scychelles, and owner of the Blairs' colonial-style plantation house. Mr Blair may wish to avoid an earbending from his landlord, a former Marxist, once backed by East Germany and North Korea, who glories in his hefty state spending on a highly successful health and education system.

Mrs Blair may feel at case with the Catholicism of the islanders, missionised by the French, who arrived in 1756. There is, however, talk of voodoo surviving among the descendants of African slaves introduced by France.

For Mr Blair, this could hardly be worse than the two rebel Labour MEPs back home who have spent this week sticking pins into their leader.

FORECAST

Northern Ireland will have a windy day with outbreaks of rain, although it will originate up later in the afternoon with sunshine and squally showers. Scotland will also become increasingly windy with rain spreading from the west, followed late on by brighter, more showery weather in the extreme west. The eastern half of England and Wales will be largely dry in the momeng with just a little early drizzle, but outbreaks of rain will reach the west and extend eastwards in the attempoon.

Outlook for the next few days New Year's Eve will be rather cold and windy with early rain in the extreme east of England cleaning to leave all areas with surpry spells and showers. Most of the showers will be in the north and west, and over northern hills hail, sleet and snow are likely. On New Year's Day some more prolonged rain will spread from the west with gales in exposed areas. During the weekend the

Spy on your neighbours I hiring your own satellit neighbours by own satellite

Your neighbours could be watching you - via a spy satellite which will take detailed pictures to order over the Internet. Meanwhile, Big Brother can track you by your mobile phone. Is this progress welcome? Charles Arthur, Science Editor, explains that whether you like it or not, it's here.

Within the next few days, Internet users will be able to order photographs showing their house and its environs to a resolution of 10ft, using pictures taken to order from an orbiting satellite - just the ticket for those arguing boundary disputes.

Meanwhile, though you may not be aware of it, the security services could be tracking your movements around the country by the signals emitted from your mobile phone while it is turned on - even if you are not using it for a call.

The arrival of the personalised spy in the sky comes through an American company called Earthwatch, based in Longmont, Colorado. Its Earlybird-1 satellite was launched from Russia and just before Christmas was successfully put into orbit, 295 miles above Earth, roughly the same height as the Mir space station. It orbits about once an hour, adding pictures to a vast database that the company is building up to · стеаte a "digital globe".

Eurlybird can take pictures in which each frame covers an area in of 3.5 square miles (9 sq km), T and each pixel, or grain, in the picture is 10ft (3m) in size. By frames, three-dimensional pic-nearest "base station" every 30 tures can be built up. That, minutes. That can also provide though, will be superseded late evidence, which can be used in lite. Spy satellites in the past had similar capabilities; despite the tales, a satellite could newspaper in Red Square. But this technology has only recently been declassified by the US military - giving American industries a huge headstart in the commercial imaging market.

"Ours is the highest-resolution satellite imagery available from a commercial source. The people of the world will soon have easy and inexpensive access to the most refined representation of our planet ever assembled," said Donovan Hicks, head of Earthwatch. "This launch also shows what can be accomplished when we pool our global technological resources, and is a vivid reminder that the Cold War is over."

Not entirely: the pictures are available to anyone, including governments - except those of Cuba, Iran, Iraq. Libya and North Korea. (Notably, China is not now among the excluded list.) But pictures of those countries will be added to the company datahase.

The resolution available brings satellite imagery into the hands of anyone prepared to pay at least £200, with the images costing about £1.80 per sq ft. If the company has not already taken a picture of the required area, you can order it yourself and - cloud cover permitting - it will be taken on the next suitable orbit.

Combined with details from mobile phones, this could allow Big Brother to know what you are doing, and trace you, throughout the day. British movealed that when required to by court order, they will allow the law enforcement agencies access to their computer data.

The invisible menace that left one dead and 102 injured

An injured passenger being carried to a hospital after returning to the New Tokyo International Airport, Narita, yesterday

A dangerous atmospheric condition made a United Airlines jet plummet 1,000 feet, throwing passengers from their seats and leaving one dead. Another 102 were injured before the pilot regained control. lan Burrell reports on the terrifying phenomenon of clear air turbulence.

Flight UA826 was cruising at 33,000 feet, two hours out of Narita airport in Tokyo, when it lurched, began to rattle then suddenly dropped like a stone.

Passengers who had just finished their evening meal were hurled into the ceiling of the aircraft. Some people suffered broken limbs, others had bloodied faces and neck injuries.

Amid the screaming, the pilot pleaded for calm, "We have just hit air turbulence and the aircraft descended 300 metres. There is no danger of a crash," he called over the intercom.

But among the 374 passengers flying to Honolulu, Hawaii, there was panic, captured by one of them on video and shown yesterday on television.

"Suddenly the plane dropped and people were jumping and falling, and things came flying at me - like juice cans, food," said Chieko Ejiri, 28, who was on her way to a holiday with with bleeding bandages on their beads and someone with his arm in a sling. And one person was crying out in pain," she added.

"I thought I was dying," said Kiyotaka Eto, a 16-year-old student from Osaka who was going seat belt saved him from injury. although he felt his body floating upwards during the drop.

His friend, Yuji Takahashi, 17, who was not wearing a belt, said, "I hit my head on the ceiling. It was like something straight out of the movies."

The plane was dropping towards the northern Pacific until the pilot brought it back under control and flew back 1,100 miles to Tokyo to be met by the emergency services. Some passengers emerged from the plane on Sunday night in neck braces, others on stretchers or wrapped in blankets.

United Airlines blamed the incident, which was over in seconds, on "severe clear-air turbulence". A spokesman said 10 passengers required hospital treatment.

"The seat belt sign was on when the plane was hit by severe turbulence." spokesman Tony Molinari. "There had to be folks who weren't beited."

The Federal Aviation Authority said it would now investigate "because we're always interested in turbulence issues". Clear air turbulence is the atmosphere's equivalent to the ed-

The turbulence typically occurs at a height of between 30-35,000ft. The plane experiences "wind shear" as it moves from a jet stream of, say, 300 knots into one of 40 knots, causing rapid loss of lift as it meets the

Such turbulence is fairly common and there have been a succession of such incidents this year. In June, a Japan Airlines jet hit turbulence near Hong Kong and 11 passengers and crew were injured, one suffering a fractured pelvis. A month later, a Qantas aircraft flew into turbulence between Brisbane and Tokyo leaving 23 injured, three seriously. Then an Alitalia jet hit turbulence shortly before landing in Caracas in September injuring19, some with broken bones.

Air passengers more frequently experience turbulence when flying through cumulonimbus clouds but the affects are far milder.

Researchers in California are close to developing a radar system which they hope will enable pilots to identify areas of instrument panel.

Royal Academy's 'Sensation' proves to be a shockingly good crowd-puller

The Royal Academy's 'Sensation' exhibition of young British artists which prompted protests and resignations was hailed yesterday as one of the most successful shows it has ever held. Louise lury explains why it proved such a crowd-puller.

The British public flocked to see explicit pornography, a bloodfilled head and a portrait of Moors murderer Myra Hindley made from children's handprints, according to figures released yesterday.

She returned on Christmas Eve, was sent home again; and was admitted at Jam on Christmas Day but discharged six hours later and told to keep taking antibiotics. Doncaster Royal Infirmary refused to comment.

Warning on diabetic drivers

Diabetic motorists who do too little to control their condition may be as big a danger as drink-drivers, experts warned yesterday. Consultant physician Dr David Kerr and specialist nurse Joan Everett. from the Royal Bournemouth Hospital, said in the Journal of Diabetic Nursing that low blood-sugar levels caused similar symptoms to being drunk and Britain's 370,000 insulin-treated diabetics needed to be more aware of the dangers, after a study of 2,000 accidents caused by drivers who collapsed at the wheel showed 340 of them were due to diabetic patients suffering a drop in blood sugar.

Tories raise spectre of one-party state

An attack on the Government's alleged appointment of 'placemen' to quangos was widened last night by Brian Mawhinney, the former Tory Party chairman. Colin Brown, Chief Political Correspondent, says the Tories see the 'quango state' being replaced by the 'one party' state.

Brian Mawhinney last night accused the Government of appointing placemen to public bodies across the country. Widening a Tory attack on the Government for sacking Tories from NHS hospital trusts, the Tory Party's former chairman said: "I think there is a common thread running through this Government, which is pursuing centralised control."

He was supported by John Redword, the shadow Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. creating new quangos, such as the commission on low pay, but was failing to appoint representatives of small businesses, because they might offer critical advice.

It followed a call by John Maples, the Toty spokesman on health, for an inquiry by Sir Leonard Peach, the Independent Commissioner for Public Appointments, into the "politicisation" of health service boards in an alleged breach by the Government of the Nolan Code of Practice on openness and transparency. Mr Maples said: "Good people with proven track records and business experience are being thrown off period ends tomorrow health service boards. They are being replaced by large numbers of Labour councillors, without so much as a letter of thanks."

Frank Dobson, the Secretary of State for Health, robustly denied the Government was replacing Tory placemen with Labour "yes" men and women to run NHS hospital trusts.He said he would not appoint Labour "deadheads" to replace "Tory deadheads", but he wanted to increase the number of women on boards, and improve local representation.

A promise to "decentralise political power throughout the UK" was one of the 10 key priorities for the Parliament in Labour's election manifesto.

The Prime Minister made the attack on quangos part of his first speech in the Commons after winning power. Opening the debate on the Queen's Speech. Tony Blair said: "A Britain that is young of mind and confident of its future must money than elected local gov ernment." Mr Blair told the anwho said the Government was - nual Labour party conference two years ago: "It is time to sweep away the quango state."

David Clark: Consultation

Jack Straw launched a Labour commitment on open :: government in September 1996 that included a promise to impose tougher regimes for controlling the way quangos conduct their affairs. David Clark, Cabinet minister for public service, published a consultation document in November to fulfil that pledge; the consultation period ends tomorrow.

However, the consultation paper Opening up Quangos made it clear the Labour Government finds the quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations have an important ... role to play. In the health service, they have the task of helping ministers to abolish the internal market in the NHS. In a report to Sir Leonard, Mr Maples accused Mr Dobson of dropping Sir Brian Hill as chairman of the Great Ormond Street Hospital for Lady McIntosh, who is a Labour councilchange a situation in which un- lor and academic, and also the elected quangos spend more wife of the Labour deputy chief nd in the Lords.

Other replacements cited in his report included Clive Wilkinson, the ex-Labour leader of Birmingham City Council, for Brian Baker, a businessman in the West Midlands; Frank McCarney, who manages the office of Mike O'Brien, the junior Home Office minister, for David Hopkins, chairman of the George Eliot Trust; and Mary Styth, a Labour councillor, for the chairman of the North Lakeland NHS trust.

Mr Dobson strongly defended his action, insisting that Ms Styth was the chair of a number of health bodies in the area with wide experience in the social services, the disabled and the elderly.

Rooms at the Ritz cheaper than places in 'child jails'

Places at the first of five new 'child jails' will be the most expensive in Britain, costing twice as much as luxury rooms at the Ritz for every offender. The disclosure, says Joson Bennetto, Crime Correspondent, is the latest controversy to hit the Government's policy of locking up young offenders.

Persistent criminals aged 12 to 15 will cost an estimated keep at the forthcoming secure training centres.

Figures obtained by the National Association of Probation Officers suggest that the cost per offender per year at Cookham Wood will be at least £250,000 = £5,000 a week. Group 4 refused to comment on £300,000 to £250,000 a year to costs, but sources suggested that the figure was less - around the £200 (00) mark.

Either amount compares unfavourably with current accommodation. A place in a loargued that the money could be cal authority secure unit costs pent more effectively. They about £130,000 per year and £32,000 in the Government's military boot camp; at Long Lartin high security prison the

The high cost of Cookham Wood is partly due to the intensive training and education provided and the high number of staff - there will be about 100 for 40 residents. The offenders will each have their own secure bedroom and the centre will have a fence around it.

The Government has given the go-ahead to build five new secure training centres for 200 youngsters who have committed three or more offences. A new detention and training order for young offenders is contained the Crime and Disorder Bill.

Harry Fletcher, assistant general secretary of the National Association of Probation Officers, said: "The resources would be better used either by a consortia of local authorities or managed by the Department of Health." The four other centres, which have yet to obtain planning permission, are intended accommodation, and twice as cost is about £50,000, while a Gringley in Nottinghamshire, deluxe bedroom at the Ritz ho- Onley, Warwickshire, and Group 4 plans to open a se- tel in London costs £355 a Medomsley, Co Durham.

The price of progress: after 39 years' service, Eddie Matthews (above) is losing his job at the Lizard lighthouse years, keepers have tended the lights that warn sailors off treacherous stretches of coastline. Now their lonely and romantic profession is to be consigned to history.

A programme to mechanise all the lighthouses around the British Isles is nearing completion. Of the 150 once manned around England, Scotland and Wales, only nine remain occupied. By next autumn, all the lighting systems will be controlled and monitored by computer from base stations in Harwich and Edinburgh.

With 39 years in the job, Mr Matthews is Britain's longestserving keeper. Last Wednesday he completed an eight-hour has been wrecked there over the will be made redundant. He is years. Mr Matthews, who was born in The Lizard, has served at some of the most isolated lighthouses, including Bishop Rock, off the Scilly Isles, and Wolf Rock, off Land's End, where ferocious storms can engulf the tower in a wall of sea. Ten years ago he was posted back to Lizard, at the southernmost tip of Britain..

Much has changed since he started out. "Back then we only had a steam radio and you pickled the meat after the first two days. Now it's like a floating hotel. We've got TV. video, Christmas dinner. In March he stereo, you name it. The only thing I miss is my pint of beer." Each lighthouse has two teams of three men who work one month on, one month off, covering a 24-hour day. As well as operating and maintaining the light, they supply weather reports, activate the foghorn and alert coastguards if a ship is in

Cost-cutting is the driving force behind the automation programme. With the advent of modern navigation aids, the beacons have grown less important to the shipping companies that fund them. Trinity House, the authority responsihie for England and Wales, says that £1.5m per lighthouse will be saved during the 15-year life of the new equipment.

The five remaining manned Scottish lights, which include Fair Isle South, between Orkney and Shetland, will be evacuated at the same time as Lizard. The last lighthouse to be left alone with the wind and the tides will be North Foreland, Kent, next October.

Trinity House stopped recruiting keepers 15 years ago, but still receives applications.

Mr Matthews is not surprised. "I love the solitude of it, the slow pace," he said. "When I'm off duty. I often sit up in the lantern and look out at the ocean. It's open sea to the horizon 29 miles away. It's a terrific view; I can watch it for

Charisma not class succeeds at university

Students who went to single-sex schools find it no more difficult to adjust to university life than those who went to co-educational ones, says a new report.

Editor, describes a study which confounds both the supporters of co-education and the champions of single-sex schools.

Judith Judd, Education

Conventional wisdom has it that single-sex schools are better for academic work but that co-education is a better preparation for life. According to researchers from Brunel University, neither is true.

They questioned 100 firstyear university students and found that students' personalities were much more important than the type of school they attended in determining how well they settled in.

The challenges of cooking. washing and learning to study more independently loomed much larger than coping with the opposite sex.

Boarding school proved to be no better preparation for university life than day school. Only a gap year and A-level results had any significant effect on the ease with which they adjusted to their new lives. The gap-year students found re- A-level exams should be turning to work more difficult than their peers, but settling in to their new lifestyle slightly casier. Those with better A-level grades found it it more difficult to settle in.

High-performing students may be more aware of the difficulties than their peers, suggest Professor Alan Smithers and Dr Pamela Robinson, the study's authors. Or they may find it less easy to get on with fellow students.

Some of the students from girls' schools did admit that it was odd having hoys around but most "anticipated difficulties which did not arise". One said she found it "refreshing to be around boys rather than girls. because I found even though academically I benefited from single-sex education, it gets very bitchy if it's just girls".

Yet the study also questions the notion that young people necessarily get better results in single-sex schools. A study published two years ago by Professor Smithers found that, though single-sex schools topped the examination league tables, their success derived from their intake and traditions rather than the fact that they were single-sex.

A further study looking at the performance of girls and boys in different types of schools, based on the 1997 GCSE and A-level results, produced complicated findings. At GCSE, girls in co-educational independent schools appear to do slightly better than those in single-sex independent schools.

At A-level, girls performance does not appear to be affected by a single-sex or mixed school. And, though boys' single-sex selective schools are ahead of all other types of school, this is at least partly thanks to the fact that they are even more highly selective than other schools because of their history and traditions, the authors say.

scrapped in favour of a Scottish Highers-style system forcing sixth-formers to study more widely, head teachers said yesterday. The A-level system, which encourages most 16-plus pupils to study just three subjects, is out of date and does not prepare youngsters for the world of work, the National Association of Head Teachers (NAHT) claims.

Nanny's appeal date set

The British nanny Louise Woodward has been given a date for the hearing of appeals in a US court against her manslaughter conviction.

Woodward could know in a little over two months if she faces a minimum 15-year jail sentence or whether she will be free to come home.

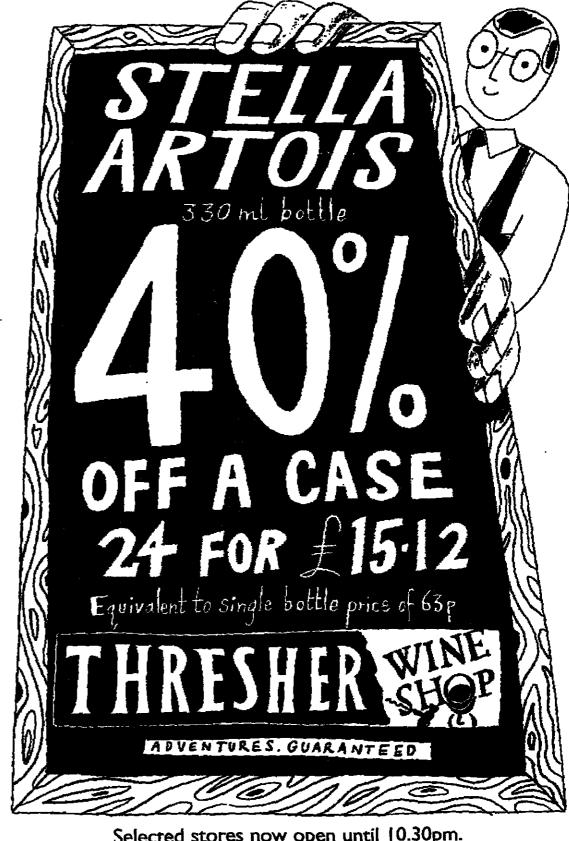

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court is due to hear appeals on 6 March, from both Woodward and the prosecution against her conviction for the manslaughter of eight-monthold Maithew Eappen while she worked for his parents.

Woodward, 19, from Elton, near Chester, has been forced to remain in Massachusetts while the appeals are heard.

The court schedule for the appeals means opening arguments from both the defence lawyers and the District Attorney's office will be lodged by 20 January, Briefs arguing against the appeals will be filed by 17 February, with both sides lodging their replies 10 days later.

The Massachusetts court system has given priority to the appeals because of the huge publicity and controversy surrounding the case.

A jury at the Middlesex Superior Court in Cambridge concicted Louise of second-degree murder, but the judge later reduced the conviction to manslaughter and freed her by imposing a sentence equal to the 279 days she had already spent in custody.

Giants who dictate diet of the nation

In the second part of our series on supermarkets, Ion Burrell examines whether the revolution in British food retailing has allowed stores to dictate the diet of the nation. Opposite, Jojo Moyes looks at Safeway's efforts to become the shop for all the family.

British supermarkets are. by almost common consent, the best in the world. But their reputation for quality control, good value and high food safety standards has been achieved only by a ruthless professionalism which has left other sectors of the British food industry reeling.

When Cornish farmers produced a supply of cauliflowers which tasted good but were yellow, they were told by the subroadening taste," FoE permarkets to plough 100 acres of crops back into the soil.

Beef farmers have been distressed to find that while supermarkets claim to have every confidence in their product. the unlabelled meat on their shelves has often been imported from Ireland.

Fishermen in Newtyn. Cornwall, are furious that large Cornish supermarkets often ignore their fresh catches in favour of stocking seafood from Scotland and elsewhere. Elizabeth Stevenson, secretary of the Cornish Fish Producers' Organisation, said the supermarkets preferred to deal on a national basis with the larger companies who could guarantee a regular supply.

"The supermarkets are very keen on fixed price, fixed size and fixed amount of supply.

to the detriment of quality. It ronmentalists this has helped should be easier to get fresh fish from a port five miles away than to bring it from Scotland."

As the supermarkets strive of choice, so British suppliers are increasingly overlooked.

The arrival of iceberg lettuces 1988 has helped reduce Britain's self-sufficiency in salad products from 89 per cent to 74 per cent. Similarly, only 25 per cent of apples consumed here are British, compared with 90 per cent selfsufficiency in France.

With the food having to travel further, it is often more exposed to chemical preservatives. Research by the campaign group Friends of the Earth suggested over Christmas that 40 per cent of fresh produce sold in Britain contained residues of pesticide. "The supermarket policy is more about profit than spokesman Adrian Bebb said. In the course of their transformation into superstores, the grocers have subsumed other sectors of the food industry. The number of master bakers has plummeted from more than 12,000 in the Fifties to fewer than 4,000. According to Trevor are becoming progressively Dixon, chief executive of the Association of Convenience Stores, thousands of grocers, butchers and other traditional shops are going out of business each vear.

"They just don't have the facilities to compete and there is still a tremendous haemorrhaging going on," he said. "In the neighbourhood environment the convenience store is often the only retailer left."

In 1972, 90 per cent of milk was delivered to our doors, They need the continuity," she compared with less than 37 per said. "I think that is sometimes cent today. To the fury of envi-

Concern have also been voiced about the intense marfor an ever-more exotic range keting by supermarkets of preprepared meals at the expense of fresh produce. Further, supermarkets are only willing to deal from southern Europe after with a small number of growers who are prepared to invest in new equipment for temperature control and handling their produce. Many of the remaining suppliers have gone to the wall.

Nevertheless, this philosophy has led to the raising of food standards world-wide. In Kenya, field-pickers once harvested beans in unhygienic conditions to be sent to Britain for packaging. Now, at the insistence of the supermarkets, the products are pre-priced and packaged by trained workers before being air-freighted.

According to Douglas Henderson, chief executive of the Fresh Produce Consortium. such efficiencies have allowed British supermarkets to "come out top on a world-wide basis". He said supermarkets did not dictate to shoppers but could react quickly to their tastes by using electronic check-outs. "They more sensitive to demand because of the sophistication of their IT systems," he said. While the supermarket rev-supply chain out of all recognition, the modern consumer is presented with an unprecedented range of more than 20,000 lines in major stores. As David Hughes, professor of agriculture at Wye College, University of London, said: "The supermarkets allow people to elect to make food choices which they feel reflect their aspirations and lifestyle."

buyout, which soared in sales after freeing itself from its huge American parent a decade ago. But it is now under pressure itself as the supermarket chain for families.

Colin Smith, chief executive of Safeway, says he is the longest-serving chief executive among the big supermarkets. It's quite an achievement. He has been in the post since ... oh, 1993. According to one analyst, these short tenures at the top are a fair measure of the pressures of the job, and of the speed at which the business moves.

It shows at Safeway, which in three years has taken itself away from being seen simply as a lower-quality rival to Waitrose. The group has gone after one core market, the family shopper. But will that be enough?

Mr Smith, married with two sons, is a family man. According to a colleague: "He does the family shop himself from time to time, shops in competitors' stores, and has very strong empathy for mums and kids, with limited budgets and time".

Perhaps with this in mind, at the height of the recession when supermarkets were floundering. Mr Smith set about a massive overhaul of the group, dubbed Safeway 2000.

The company refocused and stores now appeal to valueseeking family shoppers rather than to higher-income couples. In this way he increased number of shoppers by 50 per cent in two years, although last month the group warned of non-existent sales growth, with analysts observing that it was losing out to Sainsbury's.

Perhaps, say some, the age of the great supermarket patriarchs is over. Prior to Mr Smith, Safeway's public face was that of Sir Alistair Grant, who retired as chairman in April from his place in the triumvirate of larger-than life characters, along with Sainsbury and MacLaurin. With finance director David Webster (now chairman), Sir Alistair had bought the British subsidiary of the giant American Safeway was a great British supermarket group Safeway in dent, turnover soared from £1hn to £7bn over the next few years.

Mr Smith and Mr Webster from rivals as it tries to define use information gleaned by institutions such as the Henley group to determine Safeway's direction. According to customer development director Roger Partington, the results are often surprising.

We had thought that the shopper just wanted a continuing array of choice and variety, which they do, but it also creates confusion ... Our average supermarkets sell between 22 and 25,000 lines. It can be a bit daunting. So we set about ways to make it easier." It was information from customers than was the genesis of a pilot scheme in Basingstoke, "collect and go", where customers can ring up and order basic grocery items, and collect them when they do their fresh goods shop. According to one Safeway insider, everything the company does is to make things easier for families. "Harry and Molly [the childrenin TV advertising] convey our general market position, very much aimed at families with children 0-5," he said.

Safeway is also adopting the "market-hall" concept favoured by Asda, with increasing in-store pharmacies, dry cleaners and own-range kids clothes, replicating the traditional high street.

The group thinks there is little left to be gained from straightforward price competition, because the market is now so keen. Safeway has launched "Price Protected" - if customers buy a product cheaper elsewhere, the store gives it to them for free.

So where next? Last year, it launched a venture with BP to base "proper" supermarkets in '. 24-hour petrol stations. This may not appeal to some, but according to Safeway, it is the future. It must hope so. Because another version of the future in the trade has it that Safeway will be swallowed up by its aggressive, expansionist rival,

Ambassador gets a 30-year service

Americans describe it as "a Bee-tle on steroids", but to any ronmentally conscious city-British person of a certain age it looks like what it is: a Fifties Morris Oxford (or Austin Cambridge) with a different grille and two odd-looking scoops taken out of the bonnet.

It is the Hindustan Ambassador, and for 30 years it reigned supreme over an automobile market in which very little else was available. Today, India's roads are choked with locally produced Daewoos and Suzukis, but the Ambassador still holds its own as the car of government, the armed forces, and the universal taxi. And it is not yielding its place without a fight. Last week Hindustan Motors, manufacturer of the Ambassador, announced that it was investing 750m rupees (£11.5m) in revamping the car, improving its quality and finish and producing new niche models: a 2-litre Photograph: Tom Pilston diesel for hilly terrain, a liquid time being its unmistakable look will stay the same. Amhassadors have for years been notorious in India for their poor finish, heavy handling and proneness to alarming accidents. One local driver recalls waiting years to take delivery of his "Amby", only to find the new car had six major defects right there in the showroom, But the staid, suburban English saloon was tough and it went native. bouncing across ploughed fields packed to the gunwales with passengers, coping well with pot holes, violent treatment, amazing distances and colossal loads. Hindustan Motors still produces 2,000 Ambys a month, 150 per month down on 1996

but still a respectable number. It was never the only car available in India, but the introduction of India's first real subcompact, the Maruti (in collaboration with Suzuki) in 1985 gave the Ambassador a jolt from which it never recovered. With the liberalisation of imports over the past six years the Indian traffic jam is gradually losing its distinctive character. But new Ambassadors, fitted with 74bbp Isuzu engines, are much more reliable than their predecessors and, as a subcontinental answer, half a century on, to the Model 'T' Ford - tough, cheap (under £4,000 new) and easy to repair - it has probably got a good few years left in it.

Palestinians turn car theft into act of rebellion

Israel has one of the highest rates of car theft in the world. The thieves are mostly Palestinian and the victims Israelis. Patrick Cockburn in Jerusalem says political divisions have created a car thieves' paradise.

Four times in the past four years Lilv Herchkovitz has woken up in her house in the Arnona district of Jerusalem to find her car has been stolen overnight.

It happened first in 1993 when her Subaru 88 was taken. "I guess I was lucky that time," says Mrs Herchkovitz, 46, who runs an employment agency. "I had left a pile of Zionist literature on the back seat and the [Palestinian] thieves, having driven to Bethlehem, decided to burn it. They parked the car. and set the offending papers on fire. There was such a lot of smoke that the border police were alerted. My car was returned to me within 24 hours."

Yasser Arafat: 'Does worse than turn a blind eye'

The next year, the Subaru 88 was stolen for good. In 1995, the Subaru Legacy '91 she bought to replace it went and, a few months later, her new Mazda. "I'm wiser now," Mrs Herchkovitz says, "I'll never buy a Subaru again, since it's so popular with thieves."

israel's rate of car theft is three times higher than that in the US. Nobody is immune. Earlier this year, a Mercedes worth 350,000 shekels (£70,000) belonging to Ovadia Yosef, the spiritual leader of the religious party Shas, was stolen despite being equipped with elaborate anti-theft devices. It was found in Hebron, partly stripped.

The thefts are one aspect of the struggle between Israel and the Palestinians. Car thieves are usually Palestinian; the victims Israeli. The district where you are most likely to have your car stolen is the Sharon area, north of Tel Aviv. It is close to the Palestinian autonomous enclave at Tulkarm, where cars are cut up for spare parts in what are known locally as "slaughter

As Palestinian living stanlands plummeted over the last five years because Israel repeatedly sealed off the West Bank and Gaza, car theft became one of the few growth industries. Rubbish dumps near Palestinian towns are often heaped with the remains of stripped vehicles.

Israelis say the Palestinian Authority of Yasser Arafat, the Palestinian leader, does worse than turn a blind eye. At the end of October, Israeli police manning the main checkpoint into Gaza at Erez stopped General Zihraya Balusha, a senior offiсет in Palestinian security, who was driving in a Mercedes from Ramallah on the West Bank. Although he presented a VIP card allowing him through, the police discovered the car had been stolen four days before in Tel Aviv.

A few days earlier, police confiscated a Mercedes at Erez which had been stolen only the night before in Jerusalem. It was being driven by Musa Abu Sabha, a member of the Palestinian Legislative Council, from Hebron. He claims he was set up by "people in the Palestinian Authority who are bothered by my stand against corruption". A few days later Mr Arafat reportedly ordered the arrest of Dr Jibril Tilbani, the director-general of the Palestinian Ministry of Transport, on suspicion that he headed a ring which smuggled stolen cars from Israel to Gaza.

But the heart of the problem is very simple. Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank are desperately poor. Their per capita income has fallen by 15 per cent since 1992. Employment of Palestinians in Israel has dropped by three-quarters. Car theft is easy. In October. police stopped a stolen car and found in the vehicle a price list showing how much thieves are paid for different models. The prices ranged from about £70 for a Honda Civic to £300 for a Chevrolet Corsica.

Amos Yaffe, managing director of the ISI insurance agency, says about 40 per cent of all claims are for car theft. "There's a joke going around the insurance companies - why not pay Arafat 500 million shekels (£100m) up front for not stealing our cars," he said.

Some drivers offer ransoms for their cars by calling the thieves on the mobile phone, a common attachment in Israeli vehicles. In one co-operative farming community, Moshav Beit Yitzhak, north of Tel Aviv, which lost 60 cars in two years, residents set up their own security company which patrols 24 hours a day. Asked who steals the cars. Eli Kolan, 41, the community manager, says: Tulkarm residents. It's only about 10 kilometres from here. so in three minutes they are back home. In my opinion, they have inside information because we have about 50 [Palestinian] labourers from Tulkarm. We can't manage without them."

Penguin proves to be souvenir too far

A Japanese tourist has been charged with trying to abduct a rare penguin and for disturbing the world's only mainland albatross breeding colony, on the Otago Peninsula in New Zealand.

Takasiko Yamasaki, 30, appeared in court yesterday after police found a Blue penguin inside a bag in his rented car.

The blue penguin is a protected species which nests at sites along the peninsula, below the cliff-top Taiaroa Head albatross

Mr Yamasaki has been charged under New Zealand's Wildlife Act with abducting the penguin and with unlawfully entering the enclosed yard of the colony.

HK pins hopes on chicken slaughter

Hong Kong authorities were confident. yesterday that they had exterminated their entire stock of poultry in the drive to halt a mysterious strain of flu. Stephen Vines watched the exterminators at work and asks if this drastic measure will succeed.

At Hong Kong's central market, traders were unceremoniously breaking the necks of chickens under the eye of officials wearing white face masks and plastic gloves. They watched the chickens packed into black bin liners, which were sealed and piled into trucks taking them to landfill sites for burial.

The traders killing the livestock did not look much happier than the chickens packed in cages, awaiting slaughter. Although they stand to get some £2.30 compensation per bird, traders may also lose their business for the foresceable future.

At a poultry farm near the Chinese border where the bird flu, known as the H5N1 virus. was found to be present, whitecoated agricultural and fishery department officials arrived grim-faced with large canisters of carbon monoxide to gas the livestock.

With the birds dead, and the threat of prosecution for anyone found harbouring live poultry, a massive clean-up and fumigation exercise is under way which should leave Hong Kong with the cleanest poultry farms and markets in the world. But the bulk of the poultry entering the territory comes from the Chinese mainland, and there the authorities insist there is no sign of the H5N1 virus. A Hong Kong health official said yesterday he had little doubt that the virus was present. albeit undetected, on the mainland. Siu Jun, a spokesman for China's Guangdong Quarantine Department, pledged full Chinese support in the fight against the potentially lethal flu. The fear in Hong Kong is that if swift action is not taken. the virus will mutate and spread more readily from humans to humans. Until a boy died as a result of contracting the virus last summer, it had been thought that H5N1 was confined to chickens. It has now claimed four human lives in Hong Kong out of thirteen confirmed and seven suspected cases. The virus itself is not lethal. But if it is not identified early enough it leads to complications which can cause death.

There has been a surprising welcome in Hong Kong for the mass slaughter. But there is criticism of the way the government is handling potential victims.

Vast queues have been forming outside government clinics because authorities have declined to give testing materials to private doctors who outnumber those in public service. This is putting pressure on the public health sector and reducing the monitoring needed to keep the disease under control.

Mrs Gandhi enters fray

India's election battle moved into full sains. vesterday, with the beleaguered Congress party announcing the entry of former prime minister Rajiv Gandhi's widow into the tray.

Bringing an end to weeks of silence, during which leaders of her late husband's parmg which leads is of the support, Italian born sonia Gandhi said she would campaign for a Congress victory in the spring poli-

The return of the once hugely popular and charismatic Nehru-Gandhi family to the political stage came amid signs that the Congress party's arch-rival, the Hindu was well in the lead. An opinion poll for the India Today weekly showed that the BIP, which has backed a moderate leader, was set to substantially increase its strength in parliament.

Congress put India on course for its second elections in less than two years last month by cutting off crucial support for the minority United Front government.

The Congress party suffered its worst electoral rout amid allegations of corruption in 1996, five years after the assassination of Rajiv Gandhi by a suicide

Nuclear 'guinea pigs' call for inquiry

Australian veterans who monitored British nuclear tests in the outback in the Fifties vesterday called on the Australian government to launch a study into birth defects and illnesses they say were caused by radiation.

The call followed the publication in Australia of a British study which found high rates of birth defects in the grandchildren of British veterans of nuclear tests in Australia and the South Pacific. Ric Johnstone, president of the Australian Nuclear Veterans Association, said many of the 12,000 to 15,000 Australian nuclear veterans had died from cancer and had deformed children. Many were ordered to stand with their backs to the explosions or to enter test sites immediately after an explosion, wearing little if any protective clothing, he said, adding: "We were definitely guinea pigs."

Defence ministry officials were unavailable for comment.

Thousands flee Mexico terror gangs

Convoys of heavily armed troops, church workers and volunteers are escorting thousands of frightened Tzotzil Indians from at least three villages where armed bands have ruled by threats and violence since March. The gangs, loyal to Mexico's ruling party, are blamed for the massacre of 45 people a week ago in Chiapas state, where guerrillas of the Zapatista National Liberation Army have waged a four-yearold insurgency aimed at securing rights for the region's poor Indians.

The evacuees (pictured left) are being taken to Polho, a village populated mainly by Zapatista sympathisers. Red Cross workers said as many as 3,500 people may be making their way here. The gangs began forming and arming themselves in March, and exploited local farmers in this lush coffee-growing area near the Guatemalan border.

Corruption is clear winner in Kenya poll

Kenyans voted yesterday in a poll disfigured by blatant corruption. Ed O'Loughlin watched chaotic scenes of ballot rigging in the key town of Kitui.

By 10am yesterday, the electoral commission offices in Kitui looked as if they had been ransacked by an angry mob. They had. In the midst of the wreckage stood the local candidate, Charity Ngilu, the first woman to challenge the incumbent president, Daniel arap Moi. It was clear, she said, that the voting in her own constituency was being flagrantly rigged in favour of Mr Moi and his ruling Kenyan African National Union (Kanu).

'They have more ballot papers here than there should be," she said, brandishing the evidence. "They have not delivered them to the polling stations. They have election cards here without stamps. They have everything they need here to make more votes for somebody".

Minutes later, in an adjacent office, the constituency returning officer, Frederick Mutegi, was struggling to persuade Mrs Ngilu and her angry supporters that there was an innocent explanation for the hundreds of voter registration cars they had just found in the bottom of his desk drawer. 🕟

These cards belong to registered voters who did not collect them," he told anybody who would listen. "I was keeping the cards for them but they did not

talks after

Mrs Ngiulu's top election agents, who punched Mr Mutegi in the face and had to be restrained from jumping over the desk and throttling him.

Seizing the moment, Mrs Ngilu grabbed the ballot papers and voting cards and locked in the boot of her old Peugeot. A strange, low-speed chase then ensued, until Mrs Ngilu, trailed by her cheering supporters and foreign journalists, was cornered at a petrol station by a truckload of armed police.

After a prolonged standoff watched by Mrs Ngilu's supporters, the matter seemed resolved; the car would be driven back to the electoral commission and left there, with the boot still locked.

With widespread allegations of ballot-stuffing, vote-buying intimidation and impersonation, Kenyan elections are not for the faint-hearted. Riots and fights are commonplace between youths loyal to rival candidates. Last night, police reported two more election-related killings in Nyanza province. Earlier this year, gangs of suspected Kanu supporters killed at least 50 people in the coastal region.

The violence stems mostly from ethnic divisions. Dominated at first by Jomo Kenyatta's Kikuyu tribe and later by Mr Moi's Kalenjin tribe, Kanu has controlled Kenya since independence in 1963.

Kenya's electoral commission, which the opposition accuses of bias, says it expects the count to be finished by tomorrow. With his experience, and access to cash, President Moi remains the firm favourite.

Runaway refuge says under-13s seeking help have doubled under 13 seeking help from a runaways' refuge has doubled in the last year, the Children's Society reports today. Yet there are only four safe houses for them in Britain. Glenda Cooper, Social Affairs Correspondent, looks at the problem of child runaways.

The number of children

More children run away during January than any other month - and they are getting younger. according to new figures released by the Children's Society.

Calls and referrals from children aged 13 and under doubled during 1997, and the average age of the young people helped has fallen from 14 to 13 in re-Photograph: Glynn Griffiths cent years. Between October 1996 and October 1997 five children as young as 10 used the for an urgent meeting with Leeds Safe House - only one of four such refuges in Britain.

In January 1996, the number of children using the safe house rose by more than one-third. The society thinks that this is because Christmas and the new year can be a stressful time for families. More than three-quarters of young people who contacted the safe house had run away or been thrown out by their families; 11 per cent had run away from residential care. and 5 per cent from foster care.

Whatever the reason a child has for running away they clearly feel that the situation they are running from has reached a crisis," said Ian Sparks, chief executive of the Children's Society. "... Children who have run away tell us consistently that they have not been listened to by the adults in their life. Unless we listen, problems that may seem unimportant to us can escalate to a point where a young person feels that running away is their only option."

More than six out of ten children called as a result of abuse or threats of violence including sexual abuse and almost 40 per cent called the Safe House because of problems over physical violence. For those in care, violence from other children was the most common concern.

The charity called for the Government to provide funding for a network of street and refuge projects for child runaways, as called for in the Ut- Helpline is 0800 500 500 ting report. The charity asked ministers last August but says their request has been refused.

"It is estimated that 43,000 children run away every year, many repeatedly," said Mr. Sparks. "It is a national disgrace that successive governments have left it to charities such as the Children's Society to try to help these most vulnerable chaldren. We still have only four refuges in Britain ... all relying almost entirely on the generosity of the public for funds ... Wewant to see the Labour government make it an urgent new year's resolution to develop a strategy to tackled the increasing problem of child runaways." • A study of more than 2,000 calls about child abuse and neglect taken by the National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children Child Protection Helpline over four months found that in 23 per cent of cases of neglect parental misuse of alcohol was mentioned as a factor. It was also reported in 13 per cent of calls about emotional abuse. 10 per cent of calls about physical abuse and 5 per cent of calls about sexual abuse. The NSPCC believes the figures may underestimate the problem with alcoholism often kept secret.

Most commonly, the mother was reported as neglecting her child because she was drinking too heavily. Fathers who misused alcohol were more likely to be reported for physical abuse.

Alcoholic? Me?

DINOMMAH

The National Temperance Society claims more people than ever are shunning alcohol. Should you join them? Dr Phil helps you

Why should I take drinking advice from a doctor? Good point. An alcoholic, or so the adage goes, is someone who drinks more than his doctor. But if you don't mind the hypocrisy, your GP may at least have some insight in it, which is more than you can say for most illnesses.

Do alcoholic doctors differ from other heavy drinkers? We tend to hide it better. If medical training teaches you anything, it's how to appear competent with a distillery coursing through your veins. All you need is a stout nurse to lean against and a packet of extra-strong mints. The mints, of course, don't mask the smell, any more than tale covers unwashed genitals, but doctors, like all professionals, can rely on their status to conceal drink problems. Most hospitals have one surgeon who's a bit shaky first thing without a couple of sharpeners to warm him up.

How does alcohol work? The precise reason why two atoms of carbon, six hydrogens and an oxygen should combine to make you microwave the cat is not fully understood. Alcohol is absorbed into your bloodstream from the stomach and small intestine. This ab- a week off without crawling sorption is speeded up if up the wall? If not, get help. you drink on an empty stomach, and if the alcoholic content of the drink is between 20 and 30 per cent. Thus a surfeit of preprandial sherry can wipe you out before the hors-d'oeuvre. Alcohol is highly water soluble, and since 70 per cent of the body is water it gets pretty much everywhere. This explains the depressing list of side-effects, eg anxiety, depression, insomnia, dementia, gastritis, oesophagitis, cirrhosis, blackouts, fits, burning legs, chest pains, A couple of drinks a day cuts bronchitis, pneumonia, backache, rheumatism, gout, women have more of it than men and a smaller fluid volume, alcohol tends to concentrate more in their blood. When it reaches the brain, alcohol alters cell membranes and neuro-transmitter function. If this disruption reaches a critical level, you start singing "Ec-oh Tinky Winky" with pants at your ankles.

Although your liver works very hard to stop you making a prat of yourself, the enzymes that metabolise alcohol quickly get saturated, so you can't get rid of the stuff any faster no matter how much coffee you drink and hearty breakfasts you eat. Hence you can still be over the limit on the morning red-eye into work.

Is alcohol a euphoriant or a depressant? It can be either, depending on how much you drink and your mood when you started. Euphoria can start at a blood alcohol level of 30mg/ 100 ml and leads to the sort of disinhibition that can have such disastrous effects when it extends to the operation of heavy machinery. In a simulated driving test, bus drivers with alcohol levels of 50mg/ 100 ml (still below the legal limit) thought they could drive through obstacles that were too narrow. Such calamities are followed by a profound sense of melancholy and a wish to run away and hide. At 160-200 mg/ml, most of us slur our speech, fall over and pass out. At 400mg/ml, we usually die.

Am I an alcoholic? Aside from using your GP as a bench-mark, the best person to ask is the one closest to you. Dependence on alcohol can be psychological, when the habit becomes so deeply ingrained that the mere thought of stopping induces outright panic, or physical, when abstinence results in morning shakes, nausea and dry heaves. But the crucial question with alcohol is whether you can control the beast. Can you have

No more bingeing, no more dieting

Losing weight is just a matter of curing a food addiction? Sounds unlikely, but if it works... Millie Jenkins signed up for 'Eating Less'.

When Time Out asked readers what they really wanted, in a Christmas survey, a third of the women who replied said "to be thinner".

But if there is one thing you are guaranteed not to get at this time of year, it's a washboard stomach, I am sure all those wishful thinking women in the Time Out survey know that. They probably also know that 95 per cent of people who lose. weight on diets later put it all, and often more, back on again, However, that still won't stop them making the same old resolutions in the vain hope that things can only get flatter and firmer in the New Year.

But what if the merry-goround of seasonal bingeing and dieting could be avoided? Gillian Riley, an addiction counsellor based in North London, runs a course called Euting Less. She is best known for her book on smoking, How To Stop Smoking and Stay Stopped For Good, which has sold 40,000 copies. I went to see her three months ago about smoking and haven't had a cigarette

So I signed up for Eating Less, hoping that she could work the same magic on my thighs that she has done on my

"Eating Less" sounded like a sensible, but until now impossible, goal, Recently, when cooking an elaborately lowfat, low-glycaemic, combined (no protein and carbohydrate together) meal, my boyfriend asked, "Why don't you eat normal food, but just eat less of it?"

What a stupid question, I thought. Eating less of a normal meal is a lot harder than eating a lot of some weird concoction that doesn't qualify as real food.

The course, Gillian Riley stresses, is not for people with severe eating disorders. It is for people who have simply had enough of "yo-yoing" in and out, locked into a vicious circle of stuffing and dieting. Often they are just bored to death with worrying about food the whole time. "They may be overweight, or not," says Riley. "What they have in common is an addictive relationship with food - that's too much about pleasure and not enough about health and nutrition." Her definition of an addictive eater includes a slim person who eats only a Mars bar-feeling you're losing out on something," she says. The course was to run for five weeks, with each session lasting two-and-a-half hours. And that was just the beginning of the process. Everyone on it is female, and we range from skinny to large. I suspect we all have the same question on our lips: "Exactly how long will or a bag of crisps for lunch. "It's about how to eat less without getting thin take, please? A long time, says Riley: "It's no quick-fix solution. There will be no sudden shedding of pounds."

This process is about changing the way you think about

*People often blame overeating on hormones, genes and metabolism, and although biochemical factors are involved, the driving force is addiction in the mind," she says. The course, and the book she is currently writing, are based on a cognitive therapy technique. The aim is to look at thoughts and beliefs about food, unravel the mind's addictive impulses, and retrain it to have a more healthy, balanced relationship with food.

This she believes, is very difficult if losing weight is your only goal.

"When your eating choices are related to how you look, it clouds the real issues."

She advises throwing out the scales and finding other, more valid reasons for eating less such as reducing the risk of heart disease and cancer, living longer, having more energy and teeling more in control. "The irony of making health your priority," she points out, is that the healthy body is a leaner body." But, she adds: "It's a myth that if you eat masses of pasta. rice and wholegrains, you're OK. Eating 100 much of anything is bad for you. Even being even half a stone overweight increases the risk of degenerative diseases."

It is also important to realise that diets cannot work, for basic psychological reasons: "On any diet, you are always in "It's fine to get pleasure out a state of either compliance or rebellion. The more you comply, by sticking to the diet, the more it sets you up to rebel." So the more you tell yourself you "can't" or "aren't allowed to" eat something, the more likely you are to feel desperately deprived, and end up eating it. "After years of dieting, you tend to have deep problems

The result is that most of us have an "addictive desire" that has been reinforced countless with deprivation," she says.

"Addiction is difficult to talk about," says Riley, "It sounds so judgemental. And with food, people assume you mean severe disorders. I think addiction is a matter of degree."

But what is an "addictive desire", as opposed to valid hunger? "Addictive eating," she says, "is cating anything other than what is needed to stay in good health."

This makes my heart sink. Surely all we "need" is a handful of nuts and berries? If so, I'd rather die young and plump than old and thin. Whatever happened to pleasure?

of eating," she assures me, "but eating also needs to be about supporting your body's health." This is about making gradual, sensible changes. The key is to stop feeling deprived: to have a "free" attitude towards food, with no rules and regulations. This is a psychological trick which I found worked for smoking. The more you tell yourself you really can smoke if you want to, instead of saying you absolutely can't, the less desperate you feel.

Most of us on the course found this idea of "freedom" hard to get our heads round. After all, if you really can eat anything you want, you will, won't you?

The funty thing is, you don't. I thought life would become one long trolley dash. It hasn't.

Riley offers a technique to use at every meal, which helps you to stop and think about the urge to overeat. She encourages you to look at all the excuses you give yourself. Her theory is London No 5UX not about being perfect, so it's not like a diet, where you fall off and that's that. A few weeks on, I don't know whether I weigh less (I threw my scales out) and I don't feel any thinner. But I am eating healthier food and less of it. What I like most is the idea of never going on a diet again. The difficult thing about her technique is that it's subtle, psychological stuff. It takes a lot of thinking. But thinking is the key. Riley says it is amazing how little research has been done into the osychological side of addictive eating.

"Any research tends to be funded by pharmaceutical companies who stand to make profits on the sales of products," she points out. "It's as if the mind doesn't exist - or if it does, it's of no consequence."

There may be less money to be made using the power of thought, she says, but it is a lot more effective than any pills, quick-fix diet books or plastic surgery.

Drivers who suffer from diahetes may pose as big a risk to other motorists as those who drink, according to a study.

Low blood-sugar levels impair performance. People with insulin dependent diabetes may not realise that their driving ability is affected, researchers say. A study of 2,000 accidents caused by drivers who collapsed at the wheel found 340 were the result of diabetic patients becoming hypoglycaemic - suftering from low blood sugar. Up to one-third of insulin-treated drivers have reported suffering from hypoglycaemia.

Dr David Kerr, consultant physician, and Joan Everett, a specialist nurse, say in the Journal of Diabetes Nursing that there is an urgent need for Britain's 370,000 insulin-treated diabetics to be made more aware of the risks, so that they cat regularly and keep a supply of glucose in their cars.

Scientists have added a further piece to the jigsaw that may one day yield the genetic basis of Alzheimer's disease. Researchers from Washington University School of Medicine in St Louis, US, and the University of Madrid in Spain, compared two groups of individuals with and without Alzheimer's disease. They found three variations in a particular region of the Apo E gene. One of these caused unusually high levels of Apo E. People who had this variation were about three times more likely to have Alzheimer's than those who did not. The chief researcher, Dr Alison Goate, said, "We believe that higher levels of Apo E expression are contributing to an increase in the risk of Alzheimer's disease.

Giorgio Strehler

Giorgio Strehler, theatre director: born Barcola, Trieste 14 August 1921; died Lugano, Switzerland 25 December 1997.

Little it was indeed, the Piccolo Teatro in the Via Rovello in Milan. It had only 500 seats and a stage of very modest dimensions. The great theatre director Giorgio Strehler had founded it in 1947, with the help of the publisher Paolo Grassi, transforming an old fleapit of a cinema, where the fascist military police had tortured their victims during the war, into the leading theatre of Europe, and indeed of the world.

How on earth did Strehler do it? The secret is that he was a European through and through. He was one of those lucky mortals to be born into a multilingual family: his father was Austrian, his mother Italian, his grandparents Slav, Vi- produced works by Pirandello.

versed in four languages.

Moreover, he was a child of Trieste, and the Triestine dialect, beloved of the novelist Italo Svevo and the poet/bookseller Umberto Saba, was his fifth language. "Dialect is fundamental," he was to declare, "in the Europe of today. European Union does not mean the extermination but the exaltation of particularities, in language and in custom as well as in cheese and wine. Standardisation by the gentlemen of Strasbourg will be the death of life." He always expressed his ideas with typical Triestine dramatic volubility.

Giorgio Strehler studied dramatic art at the Accademia dei Filodrammatici in Milan and the Geneva Conservatory. He graduated in 1940, and at once started an acting and directing career in various travelling companies like the Gruppo Palcoscenico with which he

before going into exile in

From as early as 1942 he had begun publishing polemical writings that had made him a target for Mussolini's secret police. He wrote about "the responsibilities of the stage disterility of state-run theatre.

In Geneva, he produced his own company, La Compagnie des Masques, in Eliot's Murder in the Cathedral (1944). In his book "A Theatre for Life" (Per un teatro umano, 1947) be calls this his "first real stage production". He followed it in 1945 with Camus' Caligula.

Back in Milan in 1947 he founded the Piccolo Teatro. the first teatro stabile a gestione pubblica in Italy. From that date until 1955, Strehler gradually gave up acting and devoted on as many as ten productions active in the Italian Resistance eclectic repertoire and relying his favourite, Goldon's Villegon a team of actors without in a fresh contemporary style.

Strehler had already had a first success in Milan in 1945. when for the Benassi company he directed Eugene O'Neill's Mourning Recomes Electra. At rector" and the dramatic the Piccolo Teatro too he was to impose upon a new public a successes was another Brecht string of successes including Gorky's Lower Depths, which Bertold Brecht later invited him to perform in Bertin: in the first season they performed the first of the plays by Goldoni. Harlequin Servant of Two Masters, which in its six versions dominated the repertoire for 40 years, and is acknowledged to be the most representative of all Strehler's works

In 1955, the Piccolo Teatro began tending towards more realistic and epic works, and himself to direction, putting Strehler spent longer meditating on the nature of his pro-gianura (which I saw him stage "stars" devoted to performing—at the Comédie Française in the 1978-79 season) and Brecht's The Threepenny Opera, He also directed theen's A Doll's House, Chekhov's The Seagull and Shakespeare's Julius Caesar. During his first 20 years in Milan, Strehler directed 115 productions. One of his greatest Leaving Grassi to direct the Piccolo Teatro, Strehler mounted a theatre co-operative. the Gruppo Teatro e Azione. When criticised for giving way to student pressure. Strehler replied: "That was not the reason. I had long become aware of the contradictions that existed between the idea of a popular theatre I had defended since 1945 and a society that had gradually transformed itself be-

His public was no longer one anaesthetised by a quarter of a century of Italian censorship. This interval was to be a turningpoint in the maestro's career. On returning to the Piccolo

Teatro in 1973, Strehler staged King Lear, and reprised his Goldoni. He mounted one of his most beautiful operatic spectacles. The Marriage of Figuro, at the Paris Opera, to which he was subsequently invited frequently by the French government. Almost every year he brought production to the Festival d'automne at the Odéon in Paris: Goldini's Il Campiello (given again in 1993 at the Odeon, 20 years after its first creation) and his miraculously poised Cherry Orchard by Chekhov.

The Piccolo Teatro had now renounced its civic vocation as "a theatre for the workers at the lowest possible prices" and proclaimed itself an "art theatre".

Shakespeare shared the repertory with the two new Brecht productions. The Threepenny Opera and The Good Woman of Sechuan (1981) while Strehler produced Verdi's Simon Boccanegra, Macbeth and Falstaff at the Scala. In 1983, he directed the Théatre de l'Europe at the Odéon, with Corneille's Illusion consique, and the then Minister of Culture, an inspired Jack Lang, appointed him as permanent director. But in Milan the by now legendary maestro had to face serious charges for possession of cocaine and for alleged misarpropriation of European funds, charges he strongly denied. Moreover, he was weary of waiting for his new theatre to be completed, one with 1,000 seats, and in disgust with Italy Strehler went again into exile in Switzerland.

His friend Jack Lang came to his aid by accepting in 1997 the direction of the Piccolo

Giorgio Strehler's Goldoni will grace, in 1998, the stage of the Paris Odéon, whose flags flew at half mast on the news of the maestro's death.

Denver Pyle

Denver Pyle, actor, director and writer: born Bethune, Colorado. il May 1920; married (two sons): died Burbank, California 25 December 1997.

One of American's most prolific screen actors, Denver Pyle spent a lifetime - almost 50 years - acting in Westerns, his sharp features augmented in later years by a bushy beard.

He had already appeared on international television in The Life and Legend of Wyatt Earp (1956-59), and in most of his 100 films, by the time he played the vengeful sheriff in the 1967 blockbuster Bonnie and Chide (1967). The part of Buck Webb in The Doris Day Show (1968-70) then signalled his transition from acting lean and mean characters to more benevolent men in tune with their envi- also played Uncle Duncan in ronment, most successfully in Here Come the Brides (1968-70). The Life and Times of Grizzly Adams (1977-78) on television, but he was also on the small screen in the long-running role of Uncle Jesse in The Dukes of Hazzard (1979-85).

Born in 1920 in Bethune, a Colorado ranching town of just 40 people, Pyle was named Denver after the capital of that state. He attended Colorado State University, then orked in the oil fields of Texas and Oklahoma before moving to Los Angeles and becoming a page at the American television net-

Eventually deciding on acting as a career. Pyle made his feature-film début in Devil Ship (1947) and quickly established himself as one of Hollywood's great character players. Westerns became his stock-in-trade and he often appeared in four different pictures a year, most of them long-forgotten, with titles such as The Old Frontier (1950), Rough Riders of Durango (1951). Goldtown Ghost Riders (1953) and I Killed Wild Bill Hickok (1956).

But they led him to act on television in Roy Rogers (1951-64) and as Ben Thompson alongside Hugh O'Brian in the first series of The Life and Legend of Wyatt Earp (1955-56), the small screen's first "adult" Western, based on the life of a US marshal in the Old West. Pyle also took eight different roles in episodes of Gunsmoke (1956-64) and acted Sergeant Murchison in Code Three (1957) and Grandpa Tarleton in Tammy (1965-66).

In between, he continued in films, the best-known being the over-long and historically inaccurate The Alamo (1960), starring John Wayne as Colonel David Crockett, and two pictures directed by John Ford: The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance (1962), starring James Stewart. and the epic Cheyenne Autumn (1964), featuring Richard Widmark and Karl Malden in the real-life tale of a half-starved tribe of Cheyenne Indians leaving their Oklahoma reservation to return to their home ground in Wyoming, with the cavalry trying to hamper their trek. Pyle's best film role was as the sheriff in the gangster classic

Bonnie and Clyde. A watershed in his career came when he landed the part of Buck Webb in The Doris Day Show, originally set on a ranch. When, after two series, the action moved to San Francisco. Pyle's character was written out, but he continued to direct some episodes until 1973. He

Following his starring role in the film Guardian of the Wilderness (1976), as a 19th-century Yosemite Valley and waging a single-handed battle against the lumberiacks that took him all the way to President Lincoln's White House, Pyle appropriately took the part of Mad Jack in the gentle television series The Life and Times of Grizzly Adams. He had not appeared in the original 1974 film but became a regular character, also narrating the programme about James Adams (Dan Haggerty), who left his home and family for the American wilderness after being accused of a crime he did not commit. In the mountains, Adams befriended a grizzly bear, found a friend in the old trader Mad Jack and was watched over by an Indian called Nakuma.

Pyle had previously starred with Haggerty in the film The Adventures of Frontier Fremont (1976, retitled Spirit of the Wild in Britain), another tale of a man heading for the hills and the simple life. Appropriately, he enjoyed the books of Mark Twain and Jack London.

More raucously, Pyle played Uncle Jesse Duke in The Dukes of Hazzard, about two young Southern country cousins in a Dodge Charger keeping one step ahead of a corrupt politician and an inept sheriff. The series, in which the cousins shared a homestead with Uncle Jesse, featured endless car chascs and Catherine Bach as the scantily clad Daisy Duke. Pyle, who directed some episodes, also voiced Uncle Jesse in a 1983 cartoon version of the series The Dukes, as well as narrating it, and joined the rest of the cast for The Dukes of Hazzand: Reunion!, a television film made earlier this year.

His other feature films included another John Wayne picture, Cahill, United States Marshall (1973, retitled Cahill in Britain) and Maverick (1994), starring Mel Gibson and Jodie Foster in an updating of the Western television series of the Fifties and Sixties. His other television guest appearances included roles in The Dick Van Dyke Show (1963), The Andy Griffith Show (1963), The Waltons (1972). Kung Fu (1973. 1974), Murder, She Wrote (1988), Dallas (1990) and Cybill (1996).

Less than two weeks before his death, Pyle attended the unveiling of his star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame.

He spent three years working for the company in northern Manitoba and Ontario, where he learned to speak Cree, but found the life too cushy and asked for a transfer to the Arctic. When he arrived, he was determined to learn to speak Eskimo, and was told by his boss "to learn the Eskimo way, so you will know how they feel about things".

The only dictionary he had He was one of five brothers access to was a little red book municate on a basic level, but reckoned it took him three or four years to become fluent in the language: for example there are over 25 different words for snow, because in a snow environment it is vital to be able to distinguish between the differ-

He was much respected and soon adopted the Eskimo way of life, feeling part of one big family; a northern admirer wrote: "Duncan thinks and measures and becomes part of his environment just like an Eskimo." He became involved in wife-exchange and had

After 11 years with the company. Pryde left to work for the Council of the Northwest Territories, a job which involved travelling to all the settlements in the western Arctic by either sled or canoe. It also meant a much-reduced salary; realising he could not live on it. Pryde decided to live off the land with the Eskimos, as a trapper, a pattern anising was the one black mark of life he adapted to quickly. He was upset by the way the welfare system was run, feeling that it took away any work incentive.

In 1469 he married Georgina Blondin, the Centennial Indian Princess of the Northwest Territories, they had one daughter. Fiona, and lived eraft at first hand. On various in Yellowknife where they starthunting expeditions he was at- ed a development business.

century source, says that the descendants of Jesus's family were rounded up during a persecution, with a view to their land being confiscated. Eusebius tells us that "they had enough to be self-

Jewish, middle-class backthan if he had been born poor. It would appear that Jesus, in poverty. "Blessed are the poor: thing of both sides of the equa-

Yet closer attention to the Gospels reveals another side to Jesus which is much more comfortable - even middle-class. Remember that Jesus was only born in a stable because the hotels were fully booked. Mary and Joseph could actually afford B&B, so they were clearly not that poor. They had their own transport too. Moreover, when the Wise Men came to visit, they brought quite expensive gifts gold, frankincense and myrrh have never been cheap.

Ironically, portraiture of Jesus has hidden his true class origins to our detriment. It is actually probably quite important that we see Jesus as being born into a relatively comfortable world. Consider the evidence. Mary and Joseph had the money to flee to Egypt and live abroad for a few years, in order to escape Herod's wrath. Generally, the poor do not have these resources at their disposal. Carpentry was more of a skilled building industry than a basic utility trade; wood was funscholars have recently retranslated the word used for Joseph's profession - tekton suggesting that he was more of a chartered surveyor than a wood-carver.

The Holy Family could afford a pilgrimage or two. Jesus was educated; well educated, in fact - he almost certainly spoke three languages, Aramaic, Hebrew and probably Greck, and had the financial resources to learn to read and write, and trained as a rabbi. He developed the social skills to be at home with all classes of people - from the poor, to middle class families like that of Mary, Martha and Lazarus, and to wealthy members of the community. Even at his death, he owned an expensive seamless robe. and his body was smuggled away by one of his richer followers, a foreign merchant, to be given a "decent" burial.

Further support for this thesis comes, strangely enough, from Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, book iii,20. The writer, quoting a first-sufficient". Not really wealthy. but certainly comfortable.

So if Jesus was from a good, ground, what are the implications for Christians? Ironically, they are far more disturbing his ministry, turned his back on his class roots, and chose for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven." Jesus knew sometion when he said that a rich man would struggle to gain entry into heaven; he assumed the poor would be there by right. Jesus made friends amongst the poor - sinners, prostitutes, the mentally ill, widows - and he invariably challenged the wealthy over their pride and complacency. The Christian paradigm, in Jesus at least, is "Sell all you have", "Take no gold and silver for the journey", and always bless the beggar, the homeless and the hungry. It's radical stuff, and it's antibourgeois. No wonder he got on people's nerves.

The early Christian Socialists - men like F.D. Maurice, Stewart Headlam and John Ludlow - understood that God discriminated for the poor, and shared something of the radical nature of Jesus's chosen social incarnation. They worked with Chartists, radicals and other organisations to bring justice for the working class. They argued for universal suffrage, set up colleges and co-operatives, and laboured for the labourer. It damental to the structure of was a costly agenda: Maurice most housing. Indeed Italian lost a Chair in Theology at trouble. Yet he never lost sight of the imperative: the poor were God's cause, and a truly socialist society would never abandon them.

At Christmastide, we remember the Shepherds and the Wise Men who came bearing gifts for a king. What they found instead was an ordinary family, but in temporary accommodation, struggling with a new baby. It must have been quite a shock. The Wise Men had tried Herod's palace first, but found it was the wrong address. Yet the Gospels record that they still gave their gifts, expensive as they were, and left them at the poor and lowly stable.

In their own way, they too were quite radical, and they throw a question back to us. What gifts will we give to the homeless, the displaced, the poor and the marginalised? The question isn't meant to be a tax bombshell. Yet our response to the coming of Jesus must indeed "cost not less than everything".

If every other moron could drive, then so could I ...

RESOLUTIONS

THE TIME: 1996

THE PLACE: NORTH LONDON

It was about November when I realised my 1997 New Year's resolution would be the same as it always had been - to learn to drive - says Suzanne Moore. I was 37. I was pathetic. I couldn't let it go another year.

My friend recommended this lovely lesbian instructor who understood about people like me. We had a meaningful conversation on the phone. She would love to teach me to drive but she didn't have a car, which seemed a bit of a drawback.

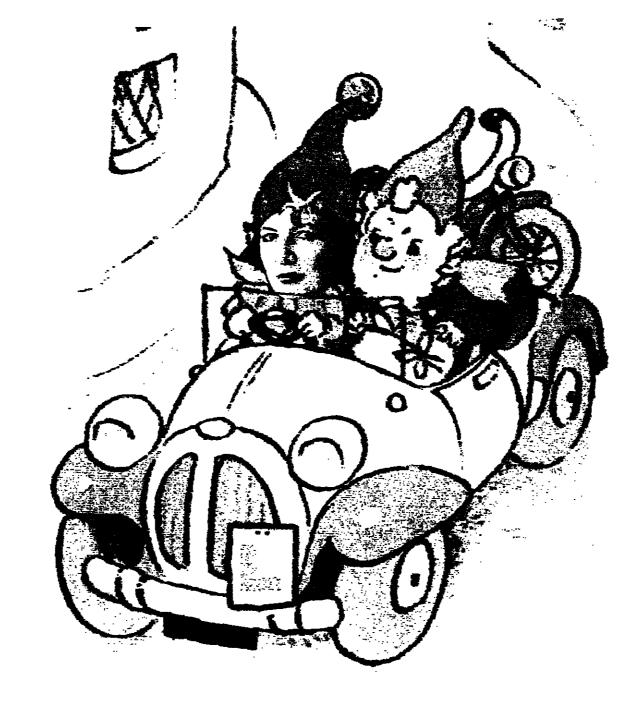

Then I remembered a highly dysfunctional friend who had miraculously been taught to drive. This man was a genius, but could barely walk along the road, and I thought whoever taught him must have something. So I phoned BSM and sought this miracle-worker out.

His name was Chas. He was profoundly depressed. He said something about having to have so many lessons for every year of my life. My life flashed past in driving-lesson years. I would need perhaps a million, but then again, said Chas - for Chas's trick was always to summon up a pupil worse than yourself -"I've got a 17-year-old at the moment. She had 100 lessons and she needs 100 more."

I wanted to talk to Chas about the deep psychological reasons why I could not drive; about my dreams, in which I was driving something like a sewing machine with just one pedal, and then even that would veer out of control. I wanted to tell him that I had explored the issue in therapy and thought it was somehow connected with my mother, who never drove, and that it was pertinent that now she was dead I was about to learn. I felt the urge to tell him that this was the most grown-up thing I had ever done - more grown-up than getting a mortgage, more grown-up than having children, even. Most of all I wanted to tell him that a huge impediment to my driving was that one of my favourite songs was Iggy Pop's "The Passenger", which summons up perfectly that crystalline, coming-down feeling of being driven through a city late at night when everything passes slowly by the window. For despite all the boy-racer mythology in my heart, I felt that there was something deeply cool about being driven rather than driving. I didn't say any of these things. Instead I blurted out: "You have no idea of how useless I am," and refused to get into the driving seat. "I'm not promising me that I wouldn't have to do anything I didn't feel ready for. I confessed that many years before I had had several bad experiences with driving instructors. One used to tell me that changing the gears was like making love, which I never understood. One used to smell of whisky, and just yell furiously at me. Another used only to let me play about with a cardboard steering wheel, and never made me do any actual driving.

never believe how many bad driving instructors there were out there. He took his job very seriously. So seriously that he was made pretty miserable by it. He had, he explained, put on lots of weight since becoming a driving instructor, and he really wanted to do something else. Every lesson he would fantasise about a different job. Sometimes he wanted to be a cameraman. Some days a journalist. Sometimes a builder. Some-Chas nodded. Chas could times he wanted to run a restaurant. Anything, really, but he a driving instructor. I couldn't blame him.

While I listened avidly to his existential search for meaning. he knew and I knew that I never really listened whenever he started talking about the clutch. traffic lights, road markings, and all the rest of it. I pretended to listen, but something just happens to me when people start talking about cars, which I have never taken any interest in. "Do you know what kind of car you are driving?" Chas asked me one day in the nearest thing he ever had to a fit of temper.

"Er ... blue?" Meanwhile, all my friends made encouraging noises, except the very close ones who thought that I should never be allowed behind a wheel. "It will change your life." "It will be so much easier for shopping." "You have to drive when you have children." These things I have never understood, either. You don't have to be a pilot to go on a plane, yet there is a massive conspiracy about cars. My children were happy and healthy despite a non-driving mother. We walked, or got buses or cabs. It was fine. I never felt particularly handicapped, but I realised that others regarded me as such.

No, I was learning to drive for myself. It was the final frontier. The ultimate in adulthood. If every other moron could drive, then so could I.

Chas was concerned that I take my test before the newfangled theory test came in. He didn't have much confidence in my ability to pass a written one. "It would involve you having to read some books, he said witheringly.

By now, I was semi-driving. Well, steering. Chas had his feet on the pedals and we would chat away. It was strange being taught something and not being invited to give an opinion. There was no point arguing with Chas about how to change gear or reverse. There was one way to do it and that was it. Driving. I realised, does not involve much space for personal expression. This was not an interpretative skill; no one cared about what you thought you were doing. You just had to do as you were told. All very difficult for someone as awkward as me.

By the day of the test I had secured so much pharmaceutical help that I could have flown to the moon. Beta-blockers from my doctor, some ancient Valium from Thailand, Librium from my sympathetic builder. When the driving test man announced. "Hello Miss Moore, I'm Mr Much", I cackled hysterically for about 10 minutes at this frightful joke about my name, until I realise that Mr Much was in fact this little man's real moniker.

"When you are calmer, Miss Moore," said Mr Much, "perhaps we could walk to the car."

"Ab, the car." I was confident I'd recognise the car. After all. it had a huge BSM sign on top. As we walked out of the test centre. I could feel the drugs beginning to take hold. I was breathing deeply, I was an oasis of calm: I would float away in the car, cruising smoothly into driving heaven.

Suddenly I realised that every bloody car outside the test centre had a BSM sign on top. For what seemed like hours I wandered about trying the key in different locks, with embar-, rassing alarms going off, until, as if by magic, it titted one,

I got in and went through the drills that Chas had made so much of. Something to do with initials and seat belts and mirrors and things. BSE or BSM or

MSM or something. Then I heard a gentle tap on the windows. It was Mr Much. I had not let him into the car. From there on in, things got

Chas was waiting patiently for me when I came back. "I couldn't find the car." I cried. Dredging up yet another story about someone more inept than me. Chas sighed: "But you did find it in the end, didn't you? I had a man once ... well, after 20 minutes the inspector came back on his own. The guy couldn't find the car and he just made a run for it ..."

Chas drove me home. There would be another test. And there was. And another, which I somehow got through. So, yes. I had done it. I had driving licence. This is the part when I am supposed to say what a difference it has made to my life. But I can't say it has, I still have cars. and those who go on about them. I am still amazed that everybody follows all the rules...

that more people don't die. I still get cabs, because there? has never been any contest between drinking and driving. I would rather sit on a bus and read than sit in a truffic jam listening to crap radio. I would rather be asleep on a train than dodging down a motorway. In short. I am not a convert. But I stuck to my resolution. I did the thing that for some daft reason signified adulthood to me. I became some kind of grownup, supposedly more in control than I was before. And now I have the proof of that, it means I can be as immature as I like.

Portillo, Rifkind, Forsyth & Hamilton as the Lost Seat Boys

Christine Hamilton as the back end of a cow A man dressed in women's clothes (to get on the women-only shortlist) Paddy Ashdown as a Wishee Washee Liberal Ken Coates and Hugh Kerr as the ugly ministers (non-supporting roles)

And special guest: Humphrey the cat as Puss

Scene: New Britain - a Fantasy Land. Spinderella, a pitiful figure, is busy sweeping issues under the carpet.

Narrator: Our pantomime starts back in May 97 As Britain wakes up in a New Labour heaven Even in Sport - we get to the ball And the future looks rosy (though not red at all). But soon comes December, A sorrowful sight Young Spinders is sobbing - let's hear of his plight Principled boy: Boo-hoo! How I wish I was off at some party Hanging around with the pop glitterati "Jamming" with Liam and Noel (my mates!) Harman (from the wings): ... And not turning up to important debates.

Principled boy: But this is a Grimm Tale - no fairy Still - at least I'm not tainted by sleaze like the Tories. Narrator: When suddenly - poof! In a thick cloud of smoke, comes: Principled boy: My Blairy Godmother?

Nurrator: That Ecclestone bloke. Bernie: Oi, Tone! Here's a million to win you some

If you let me advertise fags on my motors. The Principled Boy nods his head and executes a quick pirouettc. Narrator: But over this issue our hero has blundered

And Bernie gets all of his money refunded. Spinders unhappily sweeps up the embers Scorned even by his own Cabinet members. Rebel rump (of Pantomime Stalking-Horse): Ha! Where are your party faithful NOW? Principled boy: They're behind me! Ken Cootes, Hugh Kerr, and the boys and girls in the audience: Oh, no. they aren't! Principled boy: Oh, yes, they are! Nurrator: But away from this highly cerebral debate

Down on the farm - lurks a sinister fate ...

Farmer Twanky is in the pigsty attending to a litter of newly arrived EC subsidy application forms. Jack. the agriculture minister, approaches with a pantomime cow. Jack: Tell me - is this your 'eifer?' Farmer Twanky: Aye, that be moi Daisy. Jack: Slaughter her, man! She's clearly gone crazy. Give up the livestock and grow vegetation. Here are some beans as your compensation. The Pantomime Cow is slaughtered, culled and de-

Cow: (cheekily) Moooo! I've always wanted to be "well hung"! (winks at audience)

Jack: Now that kind of humour I cannot condone. Please take that joke back! It's far too near the bone. Farmer Twanky: (sadly) Alas, alack, poor cow of mine. Now just like Blair - she's got no spine! Narrator: But old Farmer Twanky now makes a

His handful of beans are ... the seeds of recovery! Farmer Iwanky plants the beans. They do sod all. Farmer Twanky: Not a single green shoot! This could prove to be tragic.

Gordon, the Principal Bore: Well what are you waiting for - some sort of magic? Nurrator: So Spinders is down to his final lap-top And it looks like his party is in for the chop (The chop being certified boneless, of course, And not from a cow but a nantomime horse). "I just want somebody to love me" he pleads.

Gordon: Kiss a frog? Principled Boy: What, suck up to those Euro MPs? No - what I need now isn't more hocus-pocus Find me a Group that'll help me to Focus...! Exeunt Onnies to the Think-Tank.

Scene: a Castle in the Air (Tory Party HQ) Hague and his wife. Fe-Fi-Fa-Ffion, are sleeping (in separate beds). Two new Labour MPs in stripy sweaters creep in on tiptoe. They are Blair's Ruthless Henchmen, or Banned-Its. Narrator: Does Willie wake up? No, he just keeps It's lucky political life is so boring ... The robbers make off with Hague's manifesto. Enter Munloch, a newspaper seller. Murdoch: Mirror, Mirror, hot off the press Whose is the party in distress?

The Principled Boy begins to sob. Munloch: Read all about it! A Golden Nest Egg More government scandai! Principled boy: Don't publish. I beg! Murdoch: Geoffrey Robinson Crusoe is stranded

On an island that's - handily - way out to sea. Principled Boy: If only I'd done that ...

Narrator: Our hero now curses Principled boy: ... I might now be able to pay for

Principled Boy: Oh woe! I'm as poor as an unmarried mum ... Narrator: But Aladdin Faved with his Magic Lump Appears - like a genie, straight out of thin air! Aladdin Faved: You're in tuck. I've a few (in' quid I can spare. One wave of my wad - and you'll be a rich geezer ... If you just grant me a full for ting visa.

Narrator: Now it seems as though things really CANNOT get worse (Meaning New Labour's fortunes, not simply this verse).

When Tony espies an enormous erection A Dome - with a coating of Teflon protection! Spinders calls Peter Mandini into No 10 and demands an explanation. Mandini: (slaps thigh) Will bring Britain credit!

Narrator: Mandini expounds. Principled Boy: To the tune Narrator: - laments Spinders Principled Boy: ... of millions of pounds! Spinders sends Mandini away in shame, Narrator: Spin again, Mandelson. Potential Mayor of London Town ..

Principled Boy: (slaps head): Doh! If ONLY 1 still came across as Prince Charming. Now I'm seen as dishonest and - oh NO! It's ... Harman!

Enter Harman, e traditional pantomime villain - to bear and hisses from all children in the audience. She has

Nigel Short self-destructed in the opening game of his world championship quarterfinal against Nigel Short. Thanks to some clever play in the opening (his 6...Nf6! is a big improvement on the natural exd4) he gained an early initiative and turned this into a clear space advantage on the Q-side. When Black had established a pawn chain at a5, b4 and c3, and had his hishop firmly cemented on d4. Adams could only wait for his opponent to launch an attack with f5. Both players manoeuvred their pieces to be ready for that advance, but when it happened, it looked as though Black was well on top.

Short must have planned well in advance to meet 31.Nc4 by sacrificing the exchange, but it did not turn out as well as he had hoped. After 35.f4, the position became very loose. Shirt won the pawn on c2, but it was Adams's e-pawn that won the game in Short's time-trouble.

Not much of a body... but great parts

Jez Butterworth's debut drama 'Mojo' took the Royal Court by storm in 1995, scooped an Olivier Award and has already been made into a movie, featuring Harold Pinter no less. Phil Johnson watched its first out-of-town staging, at the Bristol Old Vic.

Reservoir Dogs meets Espresso Bongo, or Absolute Beginners meets Glengarry Glen Ross? Whichever way you slice it, Jez Butterworth's tale of small-time Soho gangsters in the era of pop music's infancy boils down to a beguiling game of theatrical cross-talk in which, while the sum may mean less than its parts (and it does), the stage is held convincingly throughout and the machine gun rat-tat-tat of the characters' heroic swearing more than takes the day.

First seen at the Royal Court in the summer of 1995 (and now re-worked into a soon-to-be-released movie), Mojo is receiving its British regional premiere in a new production (by Ian Hastings) that proves quite triumphantly that Butterworth's debut drama has the legs to sustain a life beyond its initial modish success. That another set of legs severed from their body - are on stage in a dusthin for much of the action only adds to the piquancy of the piece.

With the benefit of a couple of years' critical perspective. the world of Mojo now seems satisfyingly familiar. The gangsters are out of Tarantino; the milieu is Colin MacInnes given a hefty amphetamine spin; and the dialogue is a cocktail of Mamet's Chicago mixed with the home-brewed Lucozade of good old cockney curses. All those Fifties British-movie clichés of zombie-like teenagers shaken into a trance by American rock 'n' roll live again in the figures of coffee-bar teenidol Silver Johnny and the monstrous Baby, the son of sawn-off club owner Ezra (whose legs are in the bin). As far as the plot goes, Silver Johnny has been kidnapped by a George Raft-like Mafia encroacher, and the staff of Ezra's Soho club are thus in a bit of a pickle. As in Reservoir Dogs, Macbeth or even Waiting for Godot, most of the real action occurs offstage, and what remains is the cross-talk. And as in those illustrious examples, it's enough to hold the attention.

Fittingly, it's the acting that takes the biscuit. As the hopeless heavy. Potts, William Ely gives a bravura performance of quite outstanding quality. Initially holding the stage alone with his spar, Sweets (played with a brilliantly edgy comic force by Justin Shelvin). Elv plays the sweaty. speed-fuelled no-hoper to the hilt. Like the Three Stooges as re-worked by The Fast Show, Ely and Shelvin together make up a mad double-act - Rosencrantz and Guildenstern in loafers - whose energy carries the play beyond an often sorely tried suspension of disbelief. As Baby, Anton Saunders starts fitfully - basically, he's bonkers - but grows throughout to become a convincingly chilling protagonist. Ross Boatman, as the Kray-like gangster Mickey, is perhaps less scary than the role demands, but the power of the ensemble is sufficient to see the play through.

Ultimately, perhaps, Mojo represents a triumph of incidental detail over the long view. For future generations of teenagers cramming the exam text, there's little sociological detail about either the Fifties or the Nineties to get their teeth into. But if, in the end, the resolution of the plot counts for less than the brilliance of the dialogue that leads up to it, that's fair enough: Butterworth has created a language for the theatre that teems with powerful images, both verbal and visual. Mojo might be a three-minute single rather than an album, but that in itself is a recommendation. It's one hell of a riff; the concept can come later.

There may come a time when Mo Mowlam has to step down from the job of Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. She may be worn down by the whole sorry business - improbable in a woman of her determination. Or her fate may be politically banal: a time for change in Tony Blair's Cabinet arrives, and he decides her skills would be better deployed in some other office. She may win (in a game where winning means advancing a few steps towards peaceful agreement). She may lose, and the process of round-table negotiation begun so tentatively this year collapses into bloody mayhem, to which Stormont's and London's only response will be containment, to secure minimum levels of public safety.

But one thing is clear: those who call for her to quit now are making mere passing fools of themselves. There is no case for her resigning over this Maze killing, or in the immediately foresceable future. On the contrary: her good humour and willingness to cast a fresh eye over old intractables are more than ever to be valued. One of the more depressing aspects of the last few days has been this ludicrous, high-pitched squeaking of the word "Resign".

Ms Mowlam has embarked on the correct response; to tackle security implications, to examine the administration of the Maze Prison, but above all to keep that round table going. She has recently been attacked for paying too much heed to the voices in Dublin. Well, she has not listened to the bizarre suggestion from Bertie Ahern that the peace talks should be transferred from Stormont to Londen or Dublin; hizarre, since it takes little wit to work out that any lasting political rapprochement must be made and guaranteed by Belfast's political actors. Ms Mowlam's direct responsibility for the Maze Prison also needs careful weighing. As our Northern Ireland correspondent argued yesterday, the Maze Prison is no ordinary jail. Its governor needs to make compromises in order to protect prison staff; in order to respect conventions accepted, for better or worse, in the labelling and treatment of prisoners. But murder within a prison's walls is a paradox too far. Ms Mowlam needs quickly to receive and publish a report on the killing of Billy Wright that not only explains how it happened, but also recommends a new approach to running the jail. Meanwhile it ill becomes Conservatives to let fly at the Secretary of State since, whatever the situation in the Maze, it cannot be much different now from how it was on 1 May; indeed, it is at least arguable that the Tories are wholly responsible for the climate in the Maze; it has evolved almost exclusively under their stewardship. Dr Mowlam's Tory predecessor presided over the same system of visits and concessions for one good, if unpalatable, reason: that is the system that works in the circumstances of Ulster. Labour has a long way to go to get anywhere near the Tory record in presiding over jailbreaks subsequently disowned by Tory ministers.

As for the Inla and the Loyalist terrorists, the Government has few, if any, levers over splintered fractions of movements within movements. At best, it can seek to operate on them through the "mainstream" organisations represented at the Stormont talks; at worst, it has to live with - and prepare public opinion to live with - residual terrorism of the kind seen in Dungannon the other night. If in the land of the blind the one-eyed man is king, so after 30 years of insurrection, minimised mayhem represents progress of some sort. Ms Mowlam allowed herself the other day the hope that the peace process could bear issue by late spring. She knows results, real or symbolic, have to be seen to flow relatively quickly or else the critical audiences behind the negotiators' backs will start getting murderously restive. But she also knows that - to paraphrase the quiz-show host, once things have started, perhaps they have to finish. The stake placed by the IRA grows as the peace process proceeds, Unionist politicians, too, are starting to make elaborate calculations based on the longevity of their own participation, factored by the quality and length of Sinn Fein's presence at the table. Taken at its face value - not always a naive thing to do - Martin McGuinness's response to the revenge killings was measured and moderate, though Sinn Fein remains wonyingly silent in its conversations with Irish nationalism about conceivable outcomes from the talks.

Why Ashdo

In the past four weeks, Labour has had good cause to ponder on Harold Macmillan's governing cliché: events, dear boy, events. Things happen, and ministers are forced on to their back feet. Nowhere is this truer than in Northern Ireland, where a handful of gangsters can so casily call the shots. They have no discernible plan; their victims are often randomly chosen. But Ms Mowlam can bring something to bear more powerful by far than the deployment of troops or forceful policing. She faces the New Year with the talks hoat rocking, the crew mutinous. She deserves to be defended by both her supporters and her opponents. Indeed, a grown-up Conservative leader would be giving that support to her right now.

LETTERS

Sir: Your headline "Schizophrenic jailed for killing" (23 December), gives a misleading impression of how mentally disordered offenders are dealt with. In these cases the offender is made the subject of a "restriction order" not a prison sentence. Rightly, such people become patients, (usually restricted in one of three high-security special hospitals) not prisoners; and when they are cured, or no longer considered a danger, they are discharged, usually conditionally. During that period they may, when it is deemed appropriate, be confined in less secure accommodation before their eventual discharge. There is no way of knowing - if you are on the outside -how long the period of

This is of more than academic interest for victims, or the families of victims, involved in the case, because once the offender becomes a patient there is virtually no hope of ever learning anything about his or her whereabouts or of any discharge plans, or applications to vary the "restriction order". Medical confidentiality is allpervasive and the victim has no right to know.

For families who have lost loved ones this is a cruel and unfair system. If "their" offender had been dealt with under the criminal system they would be kept informed of key developments in the custodial process. They would know roughly how long the prisoner would serve. They would be informed of any release plans and, if they wished, they could express their views. This system does not give them the right to decide on questions of release - nor should it - but the process includes them and acknowledges their involvement in what are always traumatic cases. There have been real improvements in the way that victims of crime are treated. Until fairly recently they were often treated appallingly, But for this group of people there

Sir: Your description of Antinous [left] as 'a friend' of Hadrian [right] ('Revamped Louvre dusts off its fusty old image', 19 December) is coy at best and misleading at worst. While Hadrian did not see much of his wife, his love for Antinous is one of the great romances of antiquity. After the fatal accident in the Nile, the Emperor declared Antinous a god, sent statues of him to every corner of the Roman Empire and founded a city, Antinoopolis, in his honour. - NICHOLAS PACKWOOD, Design Space and Society Research Unit, Uni-Photographs by Tom Pilston of portrait busts in the British Museum

Turkish democracy

Sir: Andrew Kevorkian's outrageous claims about Turkey (Letters, 27 December) should not be left unchallenged.

One should always begin by remembering the degree of tolerance and religious freedom that existed within the Ottoman Empire. The fact that Jewish refugees, driven en masse from Spain by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1492, settled in Ottoman domains is perhaps the best-known proof of that tolerance. Things of course started to go wrong in the Balkans towards the end of the 19th century, but here again we must be careful not to overlook half the picture: before 1878 there were SINAN AKINAL

Bulgarian Orthodox in the territory of present-day Bulgaria. The emancipation of Bulgarians (as well as Greeks) meant the expulsion, murder, and subjugation of Turks. As for the 20th century, it will not be wrong to say that, especially after the Second World War and until the mid-1970s, Turkey had a better record of democratic practices than Spain, Portugal and Greece (which were all under dictator-

This brings us to another important point: how EU membership helped European states. Knowing that Turkey will never be admitted to the EU, a great majority of the population in Turkey expect the EU to at least share some of the country's problems and understand her concerns (over Cyprus, for example). The nonsense put forward by people like Mr Kevorkian may make even this impossible.

involved in a series of programmes for Radio 4 called It's a Funny Old World in which the producer Anne-Marie Cole and I looked at the national sense of humour of different countries. We thought that Germany would be one of the hardest subjects to tackle, as we suffered from the usual British conviction that the Germans have no sense of humour, but this turned out predictably not to be the case - among other things, the Germans have a strong sense of Schadenfreude in their jokes, a strong tradition of jokes about the people of Ostfriesland very reminiscent of our Irish jokes, and even an equivalent of our Essex jokes

Several years ago I became in the form of jokes about the drinks poured out for the be envied for their good taste But the most unexpected people who drive Manta cars. thing we discovered was that the Germans watch the same funny film every year on New Year's Eve. It lasts about 20 minutes, it is called Dinner for Onc. James, and it is British. I have never seen it on British television, but every year on German TV it is shown to an audience that knows every joke in it by heart and looks forward to seeing or hearing each gag again. There are only two characters in it, an aged lady and her butler, played by the halfforgotten English comedian Freddy Frinton, who gets gradually drunker and drunker during the dinner, as he drinks all absent guests ... Now, this is obviously something we can all curl our lip at. The very idea of any nation being content to watch the same little film at the same time every year - how desperately pre-'dictable and unimaginative! The only snag in all this is that on at least two occasions I have encountered people who possessed videos of Dinner For One, James, and I have watched it, and I think it is one of the funniest films I have ever seen, and that if I had the chance to watch Freddy Frinton's inspired performance as the gradually intoxicated butler every year. I would leap at it. And that the Germans are to in humour.

One of the items that Anne-Marie Cole dug up for our Radio 4 programme on Germany was a recording of a German comedian called, I think, Loriot, who had done some routines in English for Channel 4, One of them started more or less as follows:

"Hello. My name is Loriot. I suffer from what you would call a disability. You see, I am German. Well, someone has to

This is startlingly similar to the famous Bill Bryson opening, "I come from Des Moines. lowa. Well, someone had to ...' but I think that the Loriot line is better, because it applies self-deprecatingly to a whole nation, and also because Germany plays a larger part in our national awareness than Des Moines does.

In fact. I remember that the Loriot routine went on to apologise for the unpopularity of the Germans in a sophisticated and rueful way that few British or American comedians could manage. Everyone resents the Americans abroad, in the same way that the British used to be resented, though now that our power has faded we are just seen as quaintly irrelevant. But when did you ever hear an American comedian make fun of the image of the American abroad, the insensitive, ignorant, linguistically challenged loud American abroad? When did you last hear a British comedian knock the British abroad? We British make jokes about the Germans abroad getting up at dawn and reserving pool-side places with their towels, but when did you ever hear a British comedian make fun of the atrocious image presented by the British abroad? Including our obsequious habit of respecting hy imperialistic German families ...? I gather there is a new smash hit film in Germany which does indeed look at the drunken and bad behaviour of the Boche abroad. I can't remember the name of the film. but it seems to be very much like Men Behaving Badly in Mallorca. If so, it sounds sus piciously as if the Germans are capable of laughing at themselves after all. This should worry us. The British have always prided themselves on being able to make fun of themselves, though the evidence for this has always been hard to find. It might be worrying if the Germans turn out to be betlowels laid down at dawn ter at it.

> Meanwhile, couldn't we be shown Dinner For One. James on British TV, if only once? Le don't like to think of the Germans being offered funnier programmes than us every year on New Year's Eve.

Why Blair will soon invite Ashdown into the Cabinet

When Tony Blair used to say, semi-privately, before the election that he would be more radical than people expected him to be, no one quite knew what he meant. Radical in the traditional, liberal-left sense; or radical as Margaret Thatcher meant it? Eight months on, he is entitled to feel he has started to answer that question. Whether or not you use the term "radical centre", as some Blairites do, it is not a radicalism of the right.

The sweeping reforms in education and health are designed to deliver better public services, not stimulate the use of private care. Even welfare reform, the toughest element of his programme, is designed to generate more public funds where they are needed, not shrink the state, as the Thatcherites wanted - and want - to do.

And on constitutional reform, he has been unquestionably radical in a liberal sense moving faster and farther than seemed likely to many doubters. Governments with large majorities have not been in the habit of devolving or sharing power.

Yet polling day for the Scottish Parliament will happen in May 1999. Elections for a London mayor, in its own way more of a genuinely Blairite innovation, since it wasn't even on Labour's agenda until he became leader, will take place in 2000. The White Paper on the incorporation of the European Convention of Human Rights builds into the British constitution a new and historic check on the the power of the executive. More unexpectedly, the Cabinet has approved a freedom of information measure which is significantly more liberal than it might have been. Blair first brought leading Liberal Democrats into a joint cabinet committee on constitutional reform. Then he granted proportional representation for the 1999 European elections, and followed up by underpinning his promise of a referendum look back at that list of constitutional adon electoral reform for the Commons by appointing the Jenkins commission to come up with an alternative voting system. In doing so, he showed at the very least that he is ready for the country to decide whether it wants to change the way it elects its government. It is safe to assume that he has not set up a high-powered cabinet committee on Lords reform without fully intending to push through the changes which an unboly alliance between Michael Foot and Enoch Powell forestalled in the late Sixtles.

and reserve that the

A ... - - - - ...

This is a familiar catalogue. But whether or not you agree with all the items on it, you can't really deny that it adds up, after just eight months, to a pretty formidable programme for constitutional change. And it also bas consequences for the future shape of party politics. It demonstrates, first of all, that on political reform Blair, though notably not himself a constitutional obsessive, has been prepared not just to think the conventionally unthinkable, but to do it. Which in itself suggests that he could go farther still. If he has proved that he meant what he said about so much else, perhaps we should be been saying. A good starting-point is his conference speech in Brighton in October. In a relatively short section on constitutional reform he acknowledged that "some of you are a bit nervous about what I am doing with the Liberal Democrats". Then, unrepentantly, he added: "Since this is a day for honesty, I'll tell you: my heroes aren't just Ernie Bevin, Nye Bevan and Attlee. They are also Keynes, Beveridge, Lloyd George. Division among radicals almost 100 years ago resulted in a 20th century dominated by Conservatives. I want the 21st century to be the centmy of the radicals."

I suspect that the significance of this passage has been greatly underestimated. It was the clearest sign yet that Blair is fundamentally unsympathetic (as his third Liberal hero Lloyd George was) to the wastefulness of two parties competing for the same territory in the centre and centre left. Particularly when nothing any more separates them ideologically. More important, it suggests that the unprecedented decision to bring Paddy Ashdown and his colleagues into a cabinet committee at the heart of government which, interestingly, happened with scarcely a murmur of protest in either party - is merely part of a bigger picture.

This doesn't necessarily mean a merger, at least in the foreseeable future. For the moment, the deep tribalism in the many parts of their parties that neither of them have yet reached would probably militate against it. But the logic of his conference speech does point rather clearly to something else: bringing some of the best Liberal Democrats into the Government well before the next general election.

If - and for a few hours it seemed a possibility - Blair had immediately after the election offered Paddy Ashdown the job of, say, Northern Ireland Secretary, and Menzies Campbell Defence, it would have been a hard offer to refuse. Here would have been two able men, deeply sympathetic to the Blair programme, having taken up politics because they wanted to do things rather than just say them, having the prospect of office dangled before them at long last. Probably they would nevertheless have regretfully declined. What could their party claim it had secured in return? It did not, even then, have a guarantee of proportional representation for the European Parliament, a change which would strengthen its base, but which David Steel had been humiliatingly denied in return for propping up the Callaghan government in the late Seventies. That picture has now altered quite substantially, true, they still do not have their precious Commons PR though they are closer to electoral change than they have ever been. And nobody can vances and deny that real progress has been made. What reasons, other than those of sheer tribalism, would now justify the stubborn refusal of office? My guess is that Blair is now impatient to gather together the collective anti-Tory forces, while he is ahead. All the theological discussion over electoral systems has always been subordinate in his mind to how best to keep the Tories out of office for a long, long time. He likes Ashdown. He has no patience for false arguments between politicians whose world view is fundamentally similar. It follows that if the 21st century is to be the "century of the radical", as the 20th was that of the Conservatives, the two parties of the centre left will have to start reuniting at the end of this century, just as they split in two at the beginning of it. The first step will surely be Liberal Democrats in the Cabinet. Maybe it won't happen in the next reshuffle, though it could. But some time soon, quite possibly next year, Paddy Ashdown and a handful of his colleagues will surely get the chance to decide whether they want to continue nudging - and sometimes shouting - from the sidelines, or influence re-examining some of the other things he has a Blair government from within.

On message: the images of Disneyworld are an affirmation of American ideals. Must Peter Mandelson, too, get down and vulgarise?

Mickey's real lesson for Mandelson: the American dream isn't British

DAVID WALKER HOW TO FILL THE DOME

In the middle of Disneyworld, the most artificial, unauthentic place on earth, there is a diner called L'Originale Alfredo di Roma Ristorante. Think about it.

The menu is Italian going on eclectic. You can eat fettucini and grouper Veneziana. The fish is not caught within three thousand miles of the Adriatic and you can travel from Palermo to Perugia and never once see fettucini on la carta di ciomo - nor in Rome since Alfredo, its inventor, never got closer to Italy than Lower Twelfth Street.

His eponymous ristorante. where diners are seronaded by fake opera singers, is in Epcot. the future-oriented twin of Disney's Magic Kingdom, the two fabulous cities making up Walt's Florida world.

It is a world where, to be fair to Disney's corporate bosses, gay employees can now get health insurance and other despite the hostility of American Baptists and other apostles of Christ's love on earth. Yet it is also a spick-and-span world where dirt. sex, bad language, drink and most of the other engines of human pleasure are banned or frowned upon. My abiding memory is of the person employed to march along behind the elephant in one of the many precisely timed daily processions armed not just with a bucket instantly to remove elephant muck but also with a giant aerosol can immediately to waft away any him of unfitting odour.

Encot is where, this week, our Dome Secretary, Peter Mandelson, is visiting. He needs ideas for filling the Great Space of Greenwich, His trip ought to be public money well spent. The Disney experience is the NEC-plus-ultra of theme parkery, the standard against which your Pare Asterix. Knott's Berry Form, and Alton Towers have still to be mea-

Epcot's theme was once the Future but now includes the Environment and the World or at least those images of the future and the external world that can secure corporate sponsorship while fitting the Disney world view.

In the space of a few yards, you can visit the cascades of Norway and a Morocean casbah, enter a circular cinema showing the national beauties of Canada, witness the Fountain of Nations water ballet. pilot a tecnager's brain, get shrunk to the size of a blood cell and watch a film about the developing foetus cut so as not to can, when they choose, put on offend the aforementioned Baptists, and all the while imbibe tons of corporate publicity for Kodak. AT&T and General Motors.

Epcot, in other words, is a palace of polymorphism, syncretism's sacred site - while remaining every inch and every minute as American as apple pie. Epcot is the world as sanitised, packaged and disposable. It is one of the most passive leisure experiences in the world, sitting or standing.

Yet Greenwich, if it is going to get anywhere near succeeding, will have to borrow deeply from Disney. And Walt has much to teach in terms of branding, merchandising and repeat visits. If he is going to learn those lessons Peter Mandelson will have to get closer to America in spirit than sitting close to Paul Johnson - the Americans' apostolic advocate in Britain - at dinner.

What lessons should the Minister without Portfolio carry home with him from semitropical Orlando? There is climate, for a start: Greenwich has to be made as weathernroof as possible. If an army march es on its stomuch, tourist crowds need to be fed, in gaudy, cheap and above all fast restaurants. The food at Disneyworld may taste the same but you do not have to go far to get it nor wait long for service.

Disney depends on corporate sponsorship and Peter Mandelson's anxiety will surely be whether British capitalism (forever letting socialists down) can hack it in the way American global corporate giants a fine show.

It would be easy to say the Mr Mandelson is going to have to get down and vulgarise. Despite his appearances on the terraces at Hartlepool United, he does not come across as one of nature's lads. The Ministry of Sound is the epitome of cool compared with Disney, Lady Carla Powell and her pals won't approve of some of the crowdpleasers the minister is going to have to import.

Yet the thing about Disneyworld, and especially Epcot, is the way the experience mixes an almost Reithian desire to educate and inform the masses with relentless pandering to lowest common cultural denominators. It is also, perhaps inevitably, a relentless celebration of the United States of America and all its 20th century works.

Under Epcot's domes you can see characters from The Lion King (a Disney movie, needless to say) roar in a specially made children's film about the environment. There is another film called The Making of Me which has *sensitive footage" - it would need to be in abortion-conscious America - of the developing foetus. "Spaceship Earth", inside a 180ft-tall silver geosphere, offers visitors the chance to discover "innovative interactive communications" (sponsored by AT&T). In "Honey, I shrunk the audience" - presented by Kodak - visitors can play with cameras and screens and produce their own 3-D adventure. Just as American television advertising is, by and large, unironic, direct and the crudest of selling pitches, so Disney gives you the message straight: this is the greatest country in the world with a greater future ahead of it. People gladly pay for such self-affirmation

There's Peter Mandelson's problem. He does not just lack Mickey's ears or the faith in and love for technology shown by Mickey's countrymen. Without some sheen of British national and nationalistic self-confidence Greenwich will not offer anything like the style. consistency and profitability of the Disney experience.

A glimmer of hope in Africa's slide away from freedom

VALLELY ON KENYA'S ELECTIONS

It was when they jailed a friend of mine, the editor of an innocuous church magazine in Nairobi, that I first realised just how corrup! and dangerous was the regime of the Kenyan president, Daniel aran Moi. My friend was a Kenyan of itmost probity who had dared to criticise the dictator in the mildest of terms. That was almost a decade ago and it set the seal. for me, on a raft of evidence about the matign influence of the man whose behaviour had already led his countrymen to coin the term

"paramoia". In those days the British government refused to accept the growing evidence for fear of losing a useful trade advantage. In 1988, when she visited Kenya. Margaret Thatcher, the then Prime Minister, condemned as "un-British" suggestions such as mine that not all might be well with Moi's regime. Since then the evidence has grown inescapably. Whatever the outcome today when the results are declared in the election in which Moi has stood for a fifth term of office, the country which was once the jewel in the post-colonial crown is exposed as a miasma of corruption, favouritism, patronage and worse.

Moi's insidious fingers control the police, courts and media. Rape, heatings and mob killings are his tools; torture of political prisoners and criminal suspects is routine, according to Amnesty. The UN today ranks Kenya as the third most corrupt country in the world: a massive fraud involving fictitious exports of gold has reached right to the heart of government and cost the nation the equivalent of 10 per cent of its annual GDP. Kenya's failure to deal with corruption led the IMF to suspend a $216m loan agreement last July. What is it with Africa? In next leader, 73-year-old Kenneth Kaunda, languishes in jail by order of his successor. Nigeria suffers under the tyranny of generals. Elsewhere the continent is everywhere in the grip of civil war or the aftermath of it. In Malawi and the former Zaire populations are coming to the hard realisation that life after a despot is not much easier than before. Even in liberated South Africa increasingly disconsolate citizens are wondering when real change will come in their daily lives. We know part of the answer.

These were countries which were III-prepared for independence by a colonialism which left them with imbalanced economies and an inadequate civil service. Next nature heaped on the challenge of climate change and excessive population growth. And then a one-sided system of international finance has added to all that manipulative terms of trade, an oppressive burden of debt and the the kill-or-cure pace of IMF-policed economic structural adjustment.

But there is more to it than that. The colonial period was too brief to develop in most Africans anything more than the most tenuous instinct for what democracy is about, it was not helped by the door Zambia the country's former conviction in the early days of independence that the one-party state was the solution to ethnic rivalues inside the national boundaries which the Europeans had met in Berlin to draw across the continent; there are 40 tribes in Kenya But The Party proved a passport to the patronage which might have been effective within the unhe has which descended into corruntion within the state. The West tolerated the fact because powerful dictators like Mobutu in Zaire and Moi in Kenya were a bulwark against the spread of Communism. But with the end of the Cold War the nations which controlled the aid purse strings began to demand multi-party democracy. The concept was wealten to many Africans that in Zambia a large number of voters thought that Multi-Party was actually the name of the party which was to oust the ruling. Unin party.

Even so, when Unip and its founder. Dr Kenneth Kaunda. were defeated, the father of the nation accepted the judgement of the electorate and stepped down. It was greeted as a victory for the demorratic process but the rejoicing was premature. Kaunda's successur as president. Frederick Chiluba, is demonstrating a growing authoritarianism which is disconcerting, Elsewhere, in Uganda. President Museveni has won the endorsement of the West for his "good governance" strategy to respect human rights, stamp out corruption, and clean up his administration, yet he too refuses to allow other political parties to campaign in the country. It ought to have been easier for Kenya and Nigeria, with their greater wealth and expertise. But those advantages have been steadily thrown away by consistently bad government, President Moi has amassed a fortune to rival the £5bn stolen from the people by his leopard-skin hatted friend Mobutu on such a scale that a new word was invented for this style of govemment - kleptocracy.

Moi also includges in personal extravagances - like a £32m personal jet fitted out in white leather. But politically he has been more supple. In response to pressure from Western aid donors he introduced multi-party elections in 1992, and then smothered the opposition in rules that distorted the spirit of democracy. That year he also virtually destroyed the Kenyan shilling by printing $250m worth of unsupported extra banknotes to finance his campaign. He subsequently reneged on reforms promised in the run-up to the 1992

Yet, tragically, one of the factors which has aided him most has been the inability of the opposition to ex-ordinate against him. An umbrella group, the Forum for the Restoration of Democracy, which had enjoyed majority support, split into rival factions when it came to selecting a candidate to oppose Moi. As in South Africa, it has been only the churches which have held together the opposition, monitoring human rights abuses and calling for free speech and accountable government. Their reward has been attacks on the Anglican Cuthedral by riot police with tear gas and savage clubbings.

Yet South Africa also holds a model for a solution. It does not just benefit from a more developed economy and civil society and a larger middle class. It also has a helpful demographic. Though the ANC is the dominant party, the Western Cape is run by the National Party and KwaZulu/Natal is under the control of Inkatha, It has had, perforce, to learn the politics of opposition. But it is a lesson which the rest of Africa can only

Housing data boosts hopes of soft landing for economy in 1998

Hopes for a soft landing for the economy in 1998 received a boost yesterday after the UK's biggest mortgage lender said the housing market was poised for a slowdown, while new figures showed business failures were at a sevenyear low. Diane Coyle and Michael Harrison report.

Halifax joined the other lenders in forecasting that house prices would rise more slowly in the next year. It predicted yesterday that house price inflation would drop from 6 per cent in 1997 to around 5 per cent in 1998 and 4 per cent the following year. Nationwide, the biggest building society, believes growth will fall even more sharply, from 12.6 per cent this year to 7 per

Hopes that the economy is gliding towards a gentle slowdown got a boost from separate figures showing that the number of British businesses going bust fell to a seven-year low in 1997. The figures, published by the business information group Dun & Bradstreet, showed that 36,368 businesses failed this year - a drop of nearly 5,000 on 1996 and the lowest level of failures since 1990.

Philip Mellor, a senior analyst at Dun & Bradstreet, said: Provided there is no substantial downturn in the economy, the country's annual tally of business casualties will be back to pre-recessionary levels by the millennium."

The steep fall in the number of businesses going to the wall in 1997 came as a surprise.

Halifax's forecast for house prices during the next year with a regional range of 3 to 8 per cent – is close to recent predictions from Nationwide and the Council of Mortgage Lenders (CML). The CML put the next year's increase at 5-6 per cent, while Nationwide opted for

However, this near-consensus disguises a sharp difference between the two big lenders as to what has happened during 1997. According to Halifax, house price inflation in the UK did not exceed 7.2 per cent at any point in 1997.

But according to new December figures from Nationwide, prices increased by 0.8 per cent during the month to take the annual rate to 12.6 per cent. While the upward trend has slowed, its recorded UK average house price has now reached £62,037. Paul Sanderson, head of research, said: "The market has come off the boil recently." The outlook for 1998 depended on the severity of the economic slowdown, he said.

City economists are inclined house prices probably climbed by around 9 per cent in 1997. Comprehensive Department of the Environment figures will not Halifax's new report says the idea there has been a boom based on a few areas in London. "There has been no evidence in 1997 of any 'ripple' effect away from London of this faster first quarter to under 8,000 in the growth in house prices," it says.

"Sustainable, healthy recovery" is both its prognosis for the housing market in 1998 and its diagnosis for the past 12

"No move back to housing boom and bust is likely," the report says. It adds: "If inflation in the economy generally remains at or around current levels, this 1960s pattern might well characterise the UK housing market not only in 1998 and 1999 but also for the early years of the new millennium." While Nationwide agrees that demand has weakened, it foresees a continuing recovery with a 'ripple" out to other regions.

Aside from this disagreement, the pattern of the recovery so far is reasonably clear. As Halifax's report notes, home sales has been steady at around 120,000 a month.

The annual total of 1.45 million is well up from the 1995 low of 1.1 million but well below the peak of 1.7 million in the late 1980s. The recovery in the number of transactions has come about despite the fact mortgage rates have been rising since May.

Halifax's mortgage rate has climbed from 7.25 per cent at the start of 1997 to 8.7 per cent at the end of the year. street." Goldsmiths' shares put on 12.5p to close at 275p.

Industry experts said the figures showed investors had been overly pessimistic about the sector. "When retailers say sales are slow they probably mean against budget, not against the previous year," said Clive Vaughan of Verdict, the research group. "We're still confident that December 1997 will represent sales growth over December 1996."

The risk, however, is that retailers who expected a Christmas bonanza will be left with too much stock, which then has to be discounted. The effect is expected to be particularly pronounced for seasonal goods like clothing, which were caught out by the weather, and electrical goods, where sales have fallen back after the windfall buying spree. Pay rises of up to 8% for McDonald's burger-flippers

Thousands of burgerflippers are set for bumper pay increases after McDonald's said it planned to raise the hourly rate it pays by up to 8 per cent and Burger King said it was reviewing its rates.

Peter Thai Larsen looks at a timely boost for some of the lowest-paid workers in the country as the Government's Low Pay Commission collects evidence on the planned minimum wage.

From mid-January, McDonaid's lowest-paid employees - if they are aged 18 or over - will earn £3.50 an hour, an 8 per cent increase from the £3.25 they get paid at the moment. In areas where the cost of living is high, like London, the hourly rate rises to £4.

Meanwhile Burger King, McDonald's closest rival in the fast food battle, said it planned to review pay levels on 8 January. The chain, a subsidiary of drinks group Diageo - the company recently formed by the merger of Guinness and Grand-Met - currently pays a basic hourly wage of at least £3.28 outside London, and £3.39 in the capital.

The rises will prompt speculation that sectors such as the fast food industry, which have traditionally relied heavily on low-paid workers, are preparing for the imminent introduction of a national minimum wage by the Government.

The Low Pay Commission. chaired by Professor George Bain of the London Business School, is looking into the issue and is expected to report its findings in the spring. That would pave the way for the implementation of a minimum wage in 1999.

The Confederation of British Industry argues that a minimum wage set above £3 would lead to job losses if the differential with wages higher up the pay scale was restored. The Trades Union Congress however, has asked for the wage to be set above £4.

McDonald's denied that the pay increases were related to the minimum wage. We review all wage rates every year," said a spokesman, adding that the group had to offer competitive wages to attract and retain competent staff. McDonald's expects the average pay in crease across its workforce to be closer to 5 per cent.

Similarly, a spokeswoman for Burger King said the wage review was prompted by the need to attract more staff into the industry rather than by and policy move by the govern

Both chains need the extra people. McDonald's yesterday announced an ambitious expansion plan in which it will spend £85m setting up 100 outlets in the UK in the coming year, creating about 5,000 jobs. Approximately a third of the jobs will be in the Southeast, with the same number in the North, 20 per cent in the Midlands and the rest spread across Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Flotatio

However, as each restaurant requires a full-time manage. ment team of just five, most of the jobs will be part-time. Only 35 per cent of McDonald's workforce currently work 20 hours or more a week.

Burger King plans to open 55 new restaurants in 1998, creating between 1,500 and 2,000 new jobs.

International banks extend loans to South Korea to ease crisis

The world's largest banks are poised to extend some of the $100bn (£63bn) of outstanding loans to South Korea, in an attempt to stop the crisis from spiralling across the world's financial markets. As Chris Godsmork in London and Stephen Vines in Hong Kong report, the talks came as Korea agreed to make sweeping financial reforms.

The series of meetings held in the world's big financial centres yesterday fuelled speculation that lenders were preparing to extend loans to South Korea. The discussions follow mounting fears that Korean banks will default on foreign currency loans. which have soared in value after the collapse of the country's currency, the won.

for International Settlements (BIS), outstanding loans by private financial institutions to South Korea at the end of 1996 amounted to about $99.5bn, with those from Japanese firms at $24.3bn. German and French banks have most to lose if Korean finance houses default on foreign commercial debt. Lenders in the two countries built up much of their exposure from 1993, attracted by spectacular growth loans maturing in January which would have rates in the tiger economies in Asia com- at one stage to its lowest point in two and pared with recession in their home markets.

Matthew Czepliewicz, banking analyst with Salomon Brothers in London, said the crisis could hit European banks' profits next year. "They have extremely low bad debt provisions at the moment so it wouldn't take much to upset their earnings growth", but he suggested this left room to cover provisions if Korean businesses were unable to pay their debts.

As bankers gathered to play their role in relieving the Korean crisis, legislators in Seoul finally started to bite the bullet on passing the legislation required to comply with the IMF's tough terms for its bail-out.

Last week, the IMF said it would accelerate the handover of the first $10bn of aid if Korea implemented reforms.

Working against a tight timetable they tackled 13 financial reform bills and reached agreement on the most controversial which will bring supervision over the banking, securities and insurance industry under one agency. They also agreed to scrap the ceiling on foreign ownership of South Korean shares. The optimism was reflected in the foreign currency markets yesterday where the Korean won continued to gain ground, ending the day at 1.395 against the US dollar. compared with Friday's close of 1,498. The won had touched a low point of 2,000 just before Christmas.

Korean equity markets were unable to react to the new mood yesterday because the stock market was closed. However, the Tokyo stock market, preoccupied with its own concern about insolvencies, slumped a half years. The key Nikkei 225 index, however, only fell 0.2 per cent, after recovering from a 300 point fall in early trading.

cost of pensions

The pensions industry is facing a bleak outlook in 1998, with further moves expected by the Government to remove tax breaks for retirement saving, according to Lane Clark & Peacock, a leading firm of actuaries. It said the cost of pensions had already risen by a quarter over the past five years because people were living longer and interest rates were lower. It estimated that the removal of advance corporation tax by the new Government would leave a typical individual needing to pay 24 per cent of salary into a pension fund, more than that allowed by the Inland Revenue, to gain an annual pension worth 50 per cent of salary at retirement.

Banks' ranking improves

The outlook for the UK banking sector is "broadly stable" according to Moody's analysts, with the sector set to benefit from the generally favourable economic conditions in the country. In the company's annual study of the sector, Moody's said the improved performance was rooted in "improved asset quality which was complemented by stronger pre-provision profitability as banks' cost initiatives bear fruit. UK banks now rank as among the most profitable European universal banks". Moody's added that the sector faced challenges from competition outside the sector, driven by technological innovation, and the advent of Economic and Monetary Union.

Pubs undercut high street

JD Wetherspoon, the pub company, said its 210 pubs in England, Scotland and Wales were serving a range of drinks at prices lower than those in three big supermarkets - Tesco. Sainsbury's and Asda. Wetherspoon chairman Tim Martin said: "The Campaign for Real Ale and the Monopolies and Mergers Commission bave long lamented beer prices rising above the level of inflation year after year. However, pubs are not the only culprits—some of the big supermarket chains have also been getting in on the act."

OUTLOOK ON GOVERNMENT INACTION OVER PREDATORY PRICING. HOUSING MARKET FORECASTS, AND THE SIZE OF THE FAR EASTERN CRISIS

Ducking the important competition issues

This is a self-interested piece of commentary, admittedly, but it is also one with a wider significance for business and the way it is regulated. One of our competilors, The Times, is next month planning to cut the cover price of its Saturday edition to 10p a copy. There is also some talk of it doing the same to its Thursday edition. At this stage it is not clear whether this is being considered as a one-off, promotional offer, or as a more permanent thing.

If the latter, it will mark a significant escalation in the broadsheet newspaper price war which has been raging for the past three years. The Times already charges just 10p for its Monday edition and sells at a significant discount to its main rivals throughout the rest of the week.

Rupert Murdoch, proprietor of The Times, has consistently presented his price cutting strategy as part of a long-term commercial endeavour to lift the newspaper's circulation and thereby its profitability. His main target is the market leader, The Daily Telegraph, and in pursuing his quarry, he has spent and continues to spend a small fortune.

On a number of occasions Mr Murdoch has also expressed the view that there are too many national newspapers in Britain. A subsidiary aim must, therefore, be to bring about the closure of a competitor. However, Mr Murdoch has never publicly stated this aim as such. To do so would be to invite action by the competition authorities. As things stand it is next to impossible to bring an action for "predatory pricing" unless it can be shown that the aim is to force competitors out of business. Plainly, it is therefore elected, they have been strangely silent on also next to impossible unless the predator admits to this purpose.

Why does predatory pricing matter? If it brings about lower prices for consumers, then it might be thought of as positively a good thing. That a company is pricing in an anti-competitive fashion is not just notoriously difficult to prove, it is also sometimes hard to argue that there is anything fundamentally wrong with it. In the end, however, diversity of choice is the best and only reliable way of safeguarding consumer and other public interests. It is part of the function of any government to ensure that this variety of choice is preserved and developed, for it is in diversity and the innovation that flows from it that we find the greatest chance of economic success for all.

This is particularly important in newspapers and broadcasting, because diversity of opinion, information and reporting is such a fundamental part of the democratic process. But the same arguments also apply to other industries from supermarkets to banks, and from software providers to metal bashers where big companies use their greater clout and spending power to undermine and crush smaller competitors. Anti-competitive pricing can ultimately prove as damaging to the public interest as an anti-competitive merger.

When in opposition, a number of prominent members of the present Cabinet backed the case for strengthening the law so as to make predatory pricing an easier thing to prove. Since being the matter. The Government's new Competition Bill has failed adequately to address this vital area of competition law and although several amendments have been tabled that would bring the bill into line with the tougher competition practice of the US and Australia, the Government shows no sign of accepting them. Nor has Margaret Beckett, President of the Board of Trade, or any other DTI minister, so far given an adequate explanation of why not. But then it was Mr Murdoch's Sun wot won it for them, wasn't it? Most people will draw their own conclusions.

Panto-time among mortgage lenders

It becomes a bit of a pantomime when forecasters agree about the future yet disagree about the past. However, that seems to be the topsy-turvy way of the housing market. House price rises have been very modest this year, says Halifax. Oh no they haven't, retorts Nationwide. Both close ranks to agree that price rises will be modest in 1998. Either there was no boom, or if there was it was short-lived. and the housing market will be restored to steady, sustainable growth.

As in panto, we should all probably be highly suspicious of this traditional happy ending. The lenders are fed up with being portrayed as the villains behind a volatile market that in the past has exaggerated the ups and downs of the wider economy. They want to recast themselves as fairy godmothers presiding over an orderly housing market. Unanimity in the mortgage industry about prospects for a steady recovery, an end to boom and bust, is therefore a very predictable one.

They might well be right about next year. Past and future mortgage rate rises. declining consumer confidence and an increased supply of new homes coming on to the market should all contribute to a slower rate of house price inflation. At the same time, there is enough momentum in the recovery after the dark days of the early 1990s to keep the number of home sales and house prices at a healthy level.

But the underlying structure of the housing market has not changed. The supply of land and homes is relatively fixed, while long-run demographic changes mean demand is likely to continue to grow strongly. This adds up to increases in real house prices over the long term, with sharp fluctuations in the short term because demand can adjust much faster than supply over the course of a business cycle. The fact that inflation is lower than it used to be, or that some people still bear the scars of the late 1980s boom and subsequent bust, does not alter the analysis.

The only question is whether the shift to a low-inflation background will reduce the scale of the ups and downs in house price inflation. The answer depends crucially on the experience of the latest economic cycle, the first low-inflation recovery since the 1960s. In other words, it depends on what did happen to house prices last year. As any panto-goer would warn, you need to look behind you. Too bad Halifax and Nationwide can not agree what's there.

How Asia and Mexico differ

The crisis in the Pacific Rim economies and the different, though connected, deflation in Japan, will continue to rumble on as a big story for many moons yet, but it seems plain that we are now through the main watershed and into the white water beneath. Total disaster seems to have been averted, rather in the way it was with Mexico three years ago. The long-term impact of that crisis now seems to have been virtually nil.

Arguably, the Far Eastern turmoil is also a lesser earthquake than the Latin American debt crisis of the early 1980s. which posed a real threat to the world banking system. This one compounds an already bad situation with a number of Japanese banks, but the systemic risk appears limited. All the same, the long-term meaning and impact of this crisis is as yet far from clear. Those who think it will be confined to a "mere" 1 percentage point off world growth next year are probably being unduly complacent. Certainly it is far too early to start dismissing it as "just another Mexico". One important reason for this is that the buoyant US economy helped to rescue Mexico. With Japan in such a mess, there is no such big daddy to pull the Far East out of the doldrums.

Flotations slump but buy-outs soar

The amount of money raised through stock market flota-tions has slumped this year but the total value of management buy-outs soared to a record. according to contrasting surveys published yesterday.

Total funds raised by new issues, excluding demutualisa-tions, fell from £10bn in 1996 to tions, fell from £10bn in 1996 to £3.5bn in 1997, according to KPMG Corporate Finance.

But a survey by the Centre for Management Buy-Out Research (CMBOR) shows that £10.4bn was spent on buy-outs and buy-ins in 1997 – a £2.6bn increase on the previous year. The figure could grow higher still, depending on how quickly CinVen completes the £900m buy-out of IPC Magazines from Reed Elsevier.

KPMG blamed the sharp fall

Names, who put up their own money to underwrite Lloyd's insurance policies, are leaving the market in droves since the huge losses in the late 1980s.

Latest figures show that over the course of the year, 2,020 individual members left Lloyd's, while a further 1,105 switched to underwriting on a limited liability basis - the less risky investment option of being only

The forces that drive businesses to compete on a global stage

The advent of the global company has been widely predicted in recent times - and in many ways 1997 was the year in which the soothsayers were at last proved right. Roger Trapp examines a trend that could change the way companies do Section Products business.

Globalisation was on everyone's lips as business in a range of sectors sought to explain away their need to merge, acquire or restructure - usually with the loss of several thousand jobs, even though the era of "downsizing" was supposedly over.

Price Waterbouse - which, incidentally, is one of the four accountancy and management consultancy firms planning megamergers, has put globalisation at the top of its list of "eight trends driving companies into 1998 and into the new millennium".

Scott Hartz, global leader of the firm's management consulting practice, said: Globalisation is the single biggest force driving corporate change. It affects organisational structure, technology, communications, product development, service delivery, people and training, Global 500 companies need to transform their organisations into global enterprises to compete successfully in the future."

As such language suggests, this is not a trend to be welcomed by the fainthearted. Though much is made of the benefits for the customer or client of being able to obtain goods or services from anywhere in the world at the touch of a phone button and the flash of a credit card, the ramifications for the businesses seeking to meet these ever-moredemanding consumers are huge.

Not surprisingly, more than one senior partner of an accountancy firm has barked back to a golden age of less frenzied days, when clients could be told without fear of reprisals that their problem would be dealt with as soon as the appropriate people became free.

The pressure to compete on an international stage is also apparent in the increasing use of the term "world class". No longer is it enough - except perhaps for the moment in such comparatively regulated countries as France and Spain - for a company, for example, to be the best widget maker in Britain. If its customers can buy better widgets from overseas that is a completely worthless claim.

As Douglas Lamont, a Chicago-based consultant and academic on international business, points out in his recent book Salmon Day, globalisation is - in the current parlance - a "zero-sum game". Some organisations will win and some will lose and there is no option of simply muddling through.

It is partly because of the likely extreme outcomes - for example, Barclays' decision to sell off much of BZW immediately led to the assumption that the rest of Britain's investment banking business was doomed - that globalisation is widely seen as anything but a benign force.

Certainly, those involved in running government and in watching it have long been fearful of what they see as a threat to the nation state. Much of this has to do with the sheer size of companies such as Ford, General Motors, Sony, Unilever and Shell. As Rosabeth Moss Kanter, another US management thinker, points out in her book World Class, such organisations tend to be seen as "imperial corporations" that control the flow of money, goods and information across the world.

This is the thinking that goes along with the idea of large companies having larger annual revenues than the gross domestic products of many developing countries. And while Ms Moss Kanter regards it as probably "far fetched" to say that international corporations replace governments, she accepts that "their ability to operate effectively in more than one place gives them immense bargaining power in negotiations with governments". She then quotes Percy Barnevik, the creator of Asea Brown Boveri, the Zurichbased engineer that has garnered shelves full of excellence awards without ever making much impact on the collective mind, as saying that his power to influence government was limited when he was merely head of Asca. But "today I can tell the Swedish authorities that they must create a more competitive environment for R&D or our research there will decline".

Percy Barnevik: A businessman with the power to influence governments

But it need not be all negative. The old slogan of "What's good for General Motors is good for America" signals the sort of approach that the Blair government seems to be buying into by seeking to forge as many partnerships as possible with the business community. Since business has such great power it might as well be harnessed for the greater good, it is implied. Not that it is size alone that is driving the globalisation of business. For a start, many of the companies that are at the head of the globalisation bandwagon are smaller in terms of numbers of people employed than they were 10 or 20 years ago. Second, the development that is pushing the globalisation of business is new technology, in particular, the Internet.

While it might have been possible for some time for large organisations to use their economic power to buy what they want from wherever they want, such desires have been purely wishful thinking for the man or woman in the street until comparatively recently. Now, though, an ordinary consumer equipped with a personal computer and a modem can buy a book that until recently would only have been available in the United States or can bypass travel agents and book a room in a heachhouse on a Far Eastern island.

In short, the Internet is a great leveller. Just as it enables consumers to start enjoying the same sort of access to goods and services that has long been available to corporations, so it enables a just-founded company to have the same sort of global marketing reach as a well-established organisation employing thousands of people all over the globe.

The downside to this, of course, is that right from the start the little guy finds himself competing with the big boys. And the result is that - for all but a few exceptions - business success is set to be even more fleeting than in the past, Companies will he able to enjoy huge expansion in sales on the strength of dominating a technology or a niche of the market while constantly at risk from newcomers like themselves.

PEOPLE & BUSINESS

CLIFFORD GERMAN

The award for the best punchup of the year goes to The Sunday Telegraph Christmas party. The pugilists in question were two of the City's more redoubtable PR men. Brian Basham of Basham and Coyle, and David Burnside, formerly of British Airways, who nowadays also runs his own PR agency.

The two men of course are old sparring partners from the golden days at BA and both featured in the "dirty tricks" saga involving the airline's arch rival Virgin Atlantic. At the time Burnside was running the press office and Basham was employed as BA's external public relations adviser.

Anyway, back to that office party, where Burnside's wellknown sense of humour got the better of him while Basham lived up to his name in style. Horseplay between the two somehow got out of hand and the Basham fist connected with the Burnside nose in spectacular fashion. There was blood on the carpet," said one ex-journalist, though whether this was simply a red wine stain was hard to know.

Neil Bennett, The Sunday Telegraph's City Editor, managed to despatch the two into separate cabs. Bizarrely, Basham and Burnside ended up staying in the same house, having apparently made up.

Evidently Fleet Street worked socialist are hoping Ken will its calming Yuletide magic. it all goes to show that Basham has not lost his capacity for the unexpected. Earlier this year he was involved in an incident at the Tower Thistle Hotel which resulted in one broken carpark security barrier and a rather embarrassed chauffeur being left to face the music and the hotel's less-than-amused security staff. Never a dull moment at Basham & Coyle these days.

And some news from another old bruiser. A fortnight hence Ken Livingstone, the former Labour leader of the Greater London Council and one of the leading candidates for post of Lord Mayor of London, will board HMS Belfast, the warship moored on the River Thames, to address the annual dinner given by RBS Advanta, the credit card people, for the financial press corps. Admirers of the veteran deliver a critical broadside at the Government's economic policies to date.

The choice of speaker and venue could be suggestive. Belfast herself is the last of the big-gun cruisers that served in the Second World War. She celebrates her 60th birthday next March and has been moored in the Thames since she retired in 1971. These days her 6 inch guns only fire blanks, and their next official duty will be to welcome the millennium, but I am told they could bombard Scratchwood service station on the M1 (or any other target of choice in the London area for that matter, I presume).

In the interests of evenhandedness RBS Advanta has steered from hard a starboard to hard a port. Their last speaker, a year ago, was Norman Lamont, the former Conservative chancellor, who gave the then government's economic policies a good scuffing. Our Ken will speak on a subject of his own choice, of interest to the financial community, which presumably rules our newts, but the audience will be disappointed if they do not get at least a whiff of his no-nonsense speechmaking.

Paren Knadjian the marketing director at Datastream/ICV. the financial information provider, tells me that Turkey topped his survey of bestperforming stock markets in 1997, with a gain of 222 per cent in local currency, and 78 per cent in sterling. Turkey came in just ahead of Russia. up 212 per cent in roubles and the clear winner in sterling with a gain of 202 per cent.

Paren is remarkably cheerful about the result, bearing in mind his ancestors came from Armenia, which has historically had a hard time from its neighbours, eg Turkey and Russia.

Meanwhile, the real turkeys for sterling investors were the tiger economies, Thailand, Indonesia, Malaysia, South Korea and the Philippines, plus Bangladesh, where the tigers actually live.

How many companies can boast a chairman who has won an Emmy? VFG can, for one. The AIM-quoted tiddler that rents out film-making and broadcasting equipment has landed Richard Price as its chairman. Sixty-four year old Mr Price is best known as the founder of Primetime, the UK's largest independent distributor of television programmes. He also warmed the chairman's seat at BAFTA between 1991 and 1993.

But the little statuettes the highest honour the US television industry has to offer - were awarded a few years ago for Nicholas Nickelby and Porgy and Bess, two programmes produced by Primetime. It is only a matter of time before some desperate rival goes one better and puts an Oscar winner on the board. Sir Anthony Hopkins could play the part, surely.

A top-flight British contender for the Champion Hurdle has yet to emerge, but in Ireland it is a different story. Richard Edmondson reports.

When the mind turns to the 1998 Cheltenham Gold Cup it is almost inevitable that the door of his box at Aidan palms come together also and O'Brien's yard. The plan all year create a crackle of anticipation. Dorans Pride, The Grey Monk, follow a programme of four Imperial Call, Suny Bay and See More Business have all advertised this year that the Blue Riband may be a cavalry charge Leopardstown, next month. of excellence at the foot of Prestbury Hill on 19 March. It has been rather less easy to get emotional about the Stand, last season's victor, has already been invalided out of the Maurice Camacho yesterday race, and there has been no freshly scrubbed British dauphin forcing himself under the crown. Shadow Leader, Sanmartino and Wahiba Sands, pretenders three, have hardly covered themselves in glory recently.

The ante-post favourite for hurdling's championship kept his claims in place yesterday however, when Istabraq lengthened his winning sequence to eight at Leopardstown to further suggest the prize may well be returning to Ireland.

Istabraq is clearly reading the scripts that are tossed over the has been for the five-year-old to races before the Festival, a preparation culminating in the Irish Champion Hurdle, also at in dreadful going and there was no point in punishing him," O'Brien said, "He comes back here for the Irish Champion Hurdle and then it is Cheltenham after for the Smurfit in his way as he is a former Champion Hurdle."

When those days come there will be a little, splay-footed character who will be treated with the greatest of respect by the bookmakers. J P McManus, Istabrag's owner, may not be the most physically daunting figure to roam the racecourse but he is still just about the most feared. "Istabraq looked great today," JP said. "He is holding his condition well and seems to be en-

The other horse to provide Swan did nor have to be half the wattage at gloomy Leopthrough the Leopardstown who received laurels over his quagmire to beat Punting Pete neck at Cheltenham in the spring.

The Festival bumper winner is not about to mess around with anything as inconsequential as flights of timber, and yesterday he beat a large field on his chasing debut. Florida Pearl, it must be said, is no stranger to considerable obstacles being placed point-to-point winner.

The even-money favourite had been schooled at the racetrack previously by Richard Dunwoody, who was again at the controls as his mount won by 20 lengths. "He has scope and size and the plan I agreed with Richard was that they would be up there with the pace and out of trouble," Willie Mullins, the winning trainer, said. "Once they had jumped the first two so joying his racing even more, as well I was able to relax.

"He was very quick out there and I loved the way he sprinted home from the last when Richard asked him to lengthen. He has advised us to enter the horse in the Cathcart Cup as well as the Arkle Trophy and the Sun Alliance Chase at Chel-

As connections congratulated themselves on their great good fortune in the Leopardstown winners' enclosure there was also talk of yet another contest. Florida Pearl is such a promising beast that those around him are already asking for prices about the 1999 Cheltenham Gold Cup.

RACING'S FUTURES MARKET

Following his victory in the King George VI Chase at Kempton on Boxing Day, See More Business, who promises to be even more effective over a longer distance at a stiffer course such as Cheltenham is an attractively-priced 12-1 for the Gold Cup with most firms although Coral are taking no chances and quote him at 7-1. Imperial Call is 10-1 with Coral and Ladbrokes following Sunday's bloodless success at Leopardstown. Istabrag is 9-2 with Coral and William Hill for the Champion Hurdle after his win at Leopardstown yesterday, while Shadow Leader is 6-1 generally after finishing second to Kerawi in the Christmas Hurdle at Kempton.

Rainwatch is 14-1 with the Tote for the Triumph Hurdle after his success in the Finale Junior Hurdle at Chepstow, while Upgrade is 33-1 with Coral and Ladbrokes after his easy win at Kempton.

Commanche Court is 6-1 favourite with Coral for The Ladbroke after escaping a penalty for his length win over Hard News at Leopardstown on Sunday and 10-1 with the Tote for Newbury's Tote Gold's Trophy Handicap Hurdle.

However, the one that really catches the eye in their list is Christmas Hurdle winner Kerawi (7-1), who beat Shadow Leader by threequarters of a length at level weights at Kempton and, despite a 4lb penalty, is 121b better off at Newbury.

BROWJOSHY, a highly encouraging fifth of 21 to Country Beau on his debut in a New-bury bumper in March, showed that he would soon be wrining races over hurdles when third to sesy wriner Easter Rose on his return at Windsor last month. FORM GUIDE

Tim Forster has his runners in good form and there is every chance that MR MAGNET-IC will be ready first time. The six-year-old landed a Gowran Park bumper back in June on his last run in Ireland. That was over two and a half miles, so stamma will not be a problem. King Mole is the obvious alternative. The six-year-old had lair form in bumpers last season, winning at Huntingdon, and was beaten just over three lengths in third to Two To Tango when favourite for his hundling debut at Taunton (2m 1ft, He can improve, particularly over this longer trip. Homme De Fer, a good second to Brownes Hil Lad at Hereford on his hundling bow, was beaten 17 lengths in third to Estiven at Wincanton last time but should figure in the finish. Willows Roulette, a well-beaten third when unseating at the last in Easy Feelin's Worcester race, can be given a chance of a place on the pick of last season's form.

COOLE HILL, a game winner from Naughty Future on her return at Market Rasen, would have gone close to following up at Huntingdon had she not blundered at the last, eventually going down by a length and a half to High Learle. She has been rased 3lb for that but is again not highly tried. Poucher was having his first race since beating Alice Smith 14 lengths at Hereford in February when ten lengths runner-up to Sophie May at Worcester last month. He falled to progress at Towcester recently, jumping left and finishing last of six to HBI Trix but should not be written off yet. Plimberley Place has not won for two years and was tailed off at Chepstow on his return, but the current form of the Twiston-Davies horses is encouraging. Church Law, seven lengths second to The Gopher at Warwick, was pulled up at the same course last time in Over The Deet's race. Highland Jack was no match for Strong Tarquin in a three-runner Worcester race on his return. Octo-

He has been raised 7b for that win, but Galloping Guns went on to win off a 5b higher mark at Ludlow and Northern Nation is still well handloapped off a mark of 6a. The fact that he has been given a month to recover from the run is encouraging. Entodin is is in good form but the handloapper has his measure now, as he is 9b higher than when three-quarters of a length second to Dontdressfordinner at Bangor last time, when he carried a 7b penalty for his searlier Felenham win, it is worth noting that Miss Night Owl finished about seven lengths in front of Ericolin at Teunton last month in Little Hooligan's race and is 14b better oft. Rythm Rock will appreciate the drop in class after finishing fifth to Balladur at Sandow and Sunley Secure at Newton Abbot this month. Richard Durwoody takes the ride. Indian Nectar was beeten under five lengths in fourth to Zahale at Bangor last time and rates best of the others.

He won first time out both in 1994-95 and last season and proved a userful, if not lop-class, novice hurder with victories at Hereford and Nottingham. The Hereford horses are really firing at present and this one should know his job. Henderson also runs Triple Witching, but the 11-year-old has seen his best days. Flying Gunner had huding form of a smilar level to Ebullent Equiname but has not shone in two starts over lences, last time being pulled up in Ottowa's valuable Wicroseter race. NORTHERN SADDLER showed up well in his first three races this season, including when fourth to Nashvile Star this month, beaten under rural lengths. He flooped in Well Timed's Newton Abbot race on heavy ground (which he has handled in the past) last time, but he has dropped a handly 7th as a result and a 1th lower than at Windsor. Boro Vacation Inished behind Northern Saddler at Windsor and at Fontwell in Parliamentaments race and is poorly breated with the selection Lobster Cottage has not jumped well of late and may have his own ideas about the game. His Windsor second to Frendly Knigdl was a good effort but he was beaten a long way in third to Wayfarens Way at Fakentham last time. Lightly-raced Good For A Loan has run well fresh in the past, so it was disappointing to see him pulled up at Catternak 12 days ago on his return. Stread John, a Fontwell winner on his final start last season, can do better with his recent Hereford run behind him.

Australia 309 & 257 South Africa 186 & 79-1

The new Northamptonshire paceman, Paul Reiffel, scored his highest Test score and claimed his 100th Test wicket as Australia pushed for victory over South Africa on the fourth day of the first Test in Melbourne vesterday.

Another English county player, Allan Donald, also had cause to celebrate, having become South Africa's record Test wicket-taker while taking figures of 6 for 59

Reiffel cracked an unbeaten 79 off 115 balls with six fours as Mark Taylor's team in a strong 33rd Test. position with a second innings iotal of 257.

Franks raises England's hopes

South Africa Under-19 506-9 dec England Under-19 291 &

Paul Franks showed his top-order team-mates how to occupy the crease as he made a magnificent century in England Under-19s' brave rearguard on the second day of the second Test against South Africa Under-19 in Fochville yesterday.

Franks, batting at No 9, finished unbeaten on 119 in England's total of 291 which meant they still had to follow on but gives them a great chance of a draw. At close, England were 38 for 0 with one day left.

England started the day in deep trouble on 77 for 5 and lost Jonathan Powell in the fifth over when he was bowled by the opening bowler Victor Mpitsang: of a tiring attack.

Graham Napier looked untroubled as he made 32 but drove leg-spinner Jacques Rudolph to Matthew Street at short extra cover to leave England 117 for 7.

Franks and wicketkeeper Nick Wilton, who came in when Chris Schofield was bowled, stuck to their task well, first seeing off the new ball then coping admirably with Rudolph and the left-arm wrist-spinner Gulam Bodi.

Franks played sensibly and curbed his natural attacking instincts in the overs either side of lunch as he and Wilton, who reached double figures for the first time on the tour, added 75 for the 10th wicket before Wilton was caught at third slip.

Franks brought up his halfcentury, which came off 132 balls, with a square drive off Mpitsang, then took advantage

They proved they could, although their opener and captain, Belinda Clark, shouldered much of the load with a steady 52 off 81 balls, her 11th fifty in 40 international one-day innings. It took a sharp return eatch by the off-spinner Cather-

It was unfortunate that eight of England's beaten semi-finalists did not stay to watch them do it. It is understandable that they wanted to go; that they were allowed to do so, however, did not go down well here.

Brindabella edges Exile in tight finish

The Australian maxi Brindabella won the Sydney-to-Hobart race yesterday in a cat and mouse finish with the Hong Kong pocket maxi Exile, breaking the four-year "Hobart hoodoo" of its owner and skipper, George Snow. Brindabella, the race favourite, took line honours on Hobart's Derwent River just nine minutes ahead of Exile, after a tactical duel up the river in light fickle winds and an outgoing tide. Brindabella took two days.

23 hours, 22 minutes and 48 seconds for the 630-pautical mile race, after duelling with Exile for almost the entire race along Australia's east coast. The two boats were never more than one nautical mile apart for most of the last 200 miles of the race. "It was one of the most exciting yacht race finishes in the world," said Snow, who felt confident of winning only in the last five minutes.

Brindabella's victory ends a series of disappointing campaigns for Snow, a Canberra property developer. In the past four years, Brindabella has twice finished second and twice been forced to retire with damage to gear. "It's great - no more Hooart hoodoos," an exuberant Snow said after docking at Hobart's Constitution Dock.

Snow led the initial 115strong fleet out of Sydney Harbour last Friday, followed closely by the Swedish maxi, Nicorette, and Exile. But Nicorette was forced to retire with structural damage. Warwick Miller, an expa-triate Australian businessman, made a bad start on Exile but overhauled her bigger rivals on Saturday as they sailed into strong southerly winds. By Sunday, Brindabella had regained the lead under spinnaker and the two boats began a match race off the coast of Tasmania, with the rest of the fleet off the pace.

The immediate, factual answer to Rudge's question illustrates how far Vale have come under his understated stewardship. On Saturday they visit Arsenal in the third round of the FA Cup, after which he will have managed the Burslem club in competitive fixtures against every League side except Coventry and Wycombe.

To summarise the story behind this remarkable fact: after narrowly failing to retrieve a lost cause in that first season, Rudge has presided over three promotions and a further relegation. Vale have also made three trips to Wembley, enjoyed cuptie jaunts to Old Trafford, Anfield. ### Possible successor to Rindt and Lauda looks ready to carry hopes of a nation

A young Austrian has a hard act to follow in taking over the Formula One mantle of Gerhard Berger both at the wheel of a competitive car and as a focus of national interest.

In the first of a series on newcomers to top flight sport, Derkk Allson considers the task that faces Alexander Wurz.

Embarking on a first full season in Formula One is a prospect daunting enough for any driver, but when the job carries the added responsibility of upholding a nation's distinguished tradition, it might be considered too onerous even to contemplate.

finds himself in precisely that course I am a patriot and situation as he begins a regular drive with Benetton, taking over the wheel for team and country from Gerhard forefront of grand prix racing. Up to 1970, it was the highly gifted Jochen Rindt, the first posthumous world champion. Then came Niki Lauda, champion in 1975, '77 and '84. Berger accepted the baton and although he never won the title he had 10 grand prix victories and enormous affection to ease the parting at the end of last season.

The indications are that 23-year-old Wurz has the talent and temperament to be a worthy successor. He acquitted himself admirably in three races as Berger's understudy last summer, concluding his stint with third place in the British Grand Prix.

But how about the little after Rindt, Lauda and Berger?

"I don't feel any pressure from the Austrian journalists or Austria's Alexander Wurz anything like that," he said. "Of proud to be the Austrian driver in Formula One now, but I drive for my own satisfaction. not to be Austria's next star.

"Since Rindt, we have always Austrian driver has been at the the best. Why that is I do not know. We are only a small country. But even if we knew the secret we would not tell!" For Wurz, the inspiration was not so much the achievements of his celebrated countrymen as a more modest influence closer to hand. His father, Franz, raced and although he did not become one of the luminaries, a natural path was paved for young Alexander. "My father was a driver so I grew up on the circuits." he said. "It was a way of life for me from a very early age. At school i never wanted to be a pilot or a doctor or a lawyer like the other boys. I wanted only to be a racing driver."

As an Austrian schoolboy he inevitably found recreations matter of representing Austria on skis but always he turned to wheels for his competitive fulfilment. At the age of 12, he was a world champion on BMX bikes.

Three years later, he switched to karts, fertile ground for would-be car racers. and he duly graduated to Formula Four a further two years down the road. His champi-For more than 30 years, an had an Austrian driver among onship successes at home and joined the élite at 23 his objective and Benetton-Renault summoned him on board as test and reserve driver. When illness struck down Berger mid-season. Wurz was promoted.

His impact was instant. He demonstrated not only exceptional pace but a technical appreciation many more senior drivers did not command. That podium finish at Silverstone confirmed the team's confidence and he was assigned a 1998 seat. Wurz, who has already ined the Formula One commune in Monaco, said: "I would have chosen Benetton because it is where I have done a lot of work and testing. I had made my position in the team and did not want to give that away. There is a great atmosphere here.

"I always worked at the technical side as well as the racing. My technical interest goes back to my studies. I did an en-youngest winner of the Le gineering and technical course always give 100 per cent, that of the five years because the racing was becoming too big for me to continue."

> Many predict it will hecome bigger still for Wurz. First of all, however, he must contend with fierce internal competition from another of the sport's tires, the Italian Giancarlo Fisichella, Wurz said: "He had the ex> perience of racing with Jordan last year and they were quite strong, but it is important we don't fight together. The team needs us to pull in the same direction. We are getting closer and working together, and I think it will be closer on the circuit.

Within the team, there is optimism one or both of their fledgling drivers will regenerate some of the exciting momentum Michael Schumacher brought them in the early and mid-90s. Wurz, prodently, plays down his prospects of emulating the great German.

He said: "I don't want to be compared with Schumacher because that is dangerous and not easy for any driver, I will ciate I am one of a few drivers in the world racing in Formula One, and it is hard to describe how special that feels.

"I don't know if this is the start of a new era for Benetton. They were third in the constructors' championship last year and if we could be third again this year that would be great. It will be very difficult for us to be first or second.

"I would like to finish consistently in the points and if I could get one or two podium places that would be good. It's my first year and I need to learn a lot before I talk about winning races."

This polite, lean young man has patently learned already the art of politically correct understatement but Fisichella, for one, will not be fooled he is a soft touch.

Significantly, Wurz added: With the new car regulations this year it means everyone starts from zero. That could be an advantage for the younger drivers and I want to bring out my best. I am not here for a Sunday holiday drive."

Defense the key for Bucs and Patriots

The Tampa Bay Buccane and the New England Patriot shut down their opponents most dangerous offensive play ers on Sunday to emerge victorious in their respective NFL play-off wild card games.

The Buccaneers, appearing in their first play-off game in 15 years, bottled up the elusive Barry Sanders and used a balanced offense to beat the Detroit Lions 20-10 in the NFC match-up. "It feels great, we've come a long way," said the Bucs coach, Tony Dungy. "Our defense did a great job with everything, and our offense in the first half did a great job controlling the ball." In Foxboro, Massachusetts. the Patriots hounded the Miami Dolphins quarterback Dan Mari-

Lions, who again had a player taken off on a stretcher. Quarterback Scott Mitchell lay motionless on the field for some 15 minutes after taking a blow to the head late in the third quarter. He was later diagnosed as having concussion. Detroit's play-off-clinching defeat of the New York Jets last week has been overshadowed by reer of linebacker Reggie Brown. Tampa Bay led 20-0 when Mitchell was injured, through touchdowns from Horace Copeland and Mike Alstott and two field goals. Back-up Frank Reich took over at quarterback and engineered a Detroit touchdown drive in the fourth quarter. The defensive job on Sanders ended the running back's record streak of 100-yardplus games at 14.

3.55 Film Holiday Affair (Don Hartman 1949 US). Decentish seasonal fare with widow Janet Leigh, young son in tow, being courted by two very different men: Robert Mitchum and Wendell Corey (9129721). 5.30 Whittle (S) (T) (4316672). 6.00 100 Per Cent (S) (4313585). 6.30 Family Affairs. Roy is sacked twice in one day. But Tim and Holly are both playing it cool (S) (T) (4304637). 7.00 Exclusive (S) (5765450). 7.30 Empire of the Elephant. A look at the ostrich, rather oddly, given the title of the programme (S) (T) (4393721). 8.00 Vanessa's Day with.... Neil and Christine Hamilton as they prepare to address the Oxford Union (5781498). 8.30 5 News including First on Five

(S) (T) (5760905). 9.00 First Little Shop of Horrors (Frank Oz 1986 US). Alas, not the 1961 Roger Corman cheapie, but the film version of the musical based on Corman's film. Big budget and bloated, there's a couple of decent tunes and some jazzy special effects - with Rick Moranis as the florist with the man-eating plant, Audrey II, in his basement (32198856).

10.50 The Jack Docherty Show. Another compilation, this time with Samantha Janus, Fred Macauley, Courtney Pine and Morrissey. (S) (1228498). 11.35 Prisoner Cell Block H (9236837). 12.30 Too Young to Die? (Robert Markowitz 1990 US). An abused teenager faces the gas chamber after murdering her boyfriend. Based on real events, as it you needed telling, but what might make you tune in is the presence of a young Juliette Lewis in the starring role, and a young Brad Pitt as a street hustler (S) (4803219).

2.20 Film Little Dorrit - Little Dorrit's Story (Christine 1987 UK). The sec-ond half of Christine Edzard's magnificent Dickens adaptation starting Alec Guinness, Derek Jacobi, Cyril Cusack, Joan Greenwood and, as Little Domit, Sarah Pickering (37400509). 5.25 The Road (77412122). To 5.30am.

A DOE spokesman explained the decision by saying: "In these cases we ask, 'Are they uniquely qualified to such an extent that they can bring skills and talents to the game that are not available in the UK?' We also ask, 'Have they got an established international reputation? On the basis of the information we have at the moment Schmid hasn't met those criteria."

Spurs have lodged an appeal, and as Liverpool discovered recently with Brad Friedel, such appeals can succeed. best of my ability. Even before these latest twists there had been hints that his tenure, which began in late November, might not be a long one. Despite beginning with a win at Everton, Gross's impact has been mixed, with heavy defeats by Chelsea, Coventry and Aston Villa pointing up a porous defence and an unbalanced squad.

Were he to leave there would be no shortage of candidates for his post. The arrival of Jürgen Klinsmann last week was seen by some Spurs fans as providing an ideal replacement. someone whose charisma and playing record might reproduce in N17 the talismanic effect Ruud Gullit has had at Chelsea. An alternative, at least in the short term, would be to change David Pleat's job description. ### Coppell tips Blackburn to run United close burn Rovers have the best chance of catching Manchester United in the Premiership title race. The Crystal Palace manager thinks Rovers, more than any of the other contenders, can mount a serious challenge to his former club because of the quality of their squad.

Coppell claimed he was not that shocked when United lost at Coventry and believes they could be hampered in the new year by fixture congestion as they chase trophies on three

"Blackburn are a realistic possibility given the quality and depth of their squad." he said. "You can say they more than anyone else have the best chance of pushing United all the way to the wire. Blackburn can play badly and still pick up points, which is a good sign.
